Sanitary sewage

lieve that such sewer service charges would be acceptable to the Citizens

The cost of the system is chiefly in pipe, trench and rock excavation. The cheapest type of pipe suitable to carry the sewage, namely vitrified clay, is planned for use. Depths of sewers have been specified as shallow as practical to avoid surface breakage and to avoid conflicts with water, gas and storm water pipes, no attempt is made to drain any sanitary sewage from basements. Therefore there is no way of cutting down costs except by removing sewer lines which would remove customers to share the cost.

To reduce the cost of the treatment plant would be inefficient in quality of effluent. As the receiving stream is small and close to habitation it would be inviting trouble to practice anything but thorough complete treatment of the sewage.

The above facts were estimated with the help of the completed plans by Howard K. Bell consulting engineers.

Strawberry rots and control

Strawberry patches at the Princeton Substation have been treated for protection against fruit rot and leaf diseases for several years, and these treatments have brought significant increases in the yield of marketable berries. Application of Captan, a fungicidal product, during three years at the Substation, and also in commercial tests in western Kentucky, has increased yields 30 to 50 crates per acre, says W. D. Armstrong, horticulturist at the Substation.

The 1957 season, however, was not as good generally as most previous years, and some strawberry growers became discouraged. Don't quit strawberries out. Armstrong says. They have proved to be a dependable crop in Kentucky, as well as a good source of home-grown fruit for the table.

In most cases, strawberry failures and losses in 1957 were due to frost damage or too much rain before. during and after harvest. Such conditions favor the development of a great deal of soft, rotted fruit and the worst leaf-disease damage in years.

As to 1958, there are lots of things that will determine whether serious fruit rotting and leaf disease will develop again. As a precaution it will be wise to make three or four applications of Captan dust or sprays, starting shortly before blooming and extending up to a few days before harvest.

Of all the varieties grown at the Substation and in commercial tests last year, the Pocahontas variety suffered most from leaf spot, leaf scorch, and rotted fruit. Blakemore also suffered heavily from leaf spot and rot. Tennessee Beauty gave the best performance generally of any widely used Kentucky varieties, with hardly any leaf troubles and only a moderate amount of rotted fruit. Earlidawn, a very early berry and a new introduction from the USDA was very promising at Princeton as a heavy producer.

Bluegrass Plant Bug Treatment Time Here

Bluegrass plant bugs, pests which attack seedheads of valuable bluegrass, are beginning to emerge now, says the Kentucky Experiment Station entomology department. Treatment should be started quickly to control these pests, they cut profits considerably during seed development time.

Here's how to control the pests, divided principally into two categories. "Miris dolobratus" and "Acrhlyttus nasutus".

Use three ounces of actual dieldrin in the emulsion concentrate per acre in sprays. Research has shown this material will give nearly 100 percent control of the bugs if applied properly.

Aldrin and heptachlor are ounces actual material (emulsion concentrate) per acre in sprays, also are efficient. There are two concentrations of each of these materials commercially available, the extra-strength says. They are two-pounds per gallon strength; and four pounds per gallon strength. If the two-pounds-per-gallon strength is used, it takes one quart of concentration for a proper spray; for the 4-pound formulation, one pint of the concentration is advised. At least five gallons of water per acre should be used for all the sprays, and up to 20 gallons of water per acre is preferred.

May 1 usually is the best date for starting the spray program; however, a long winter and a cold spring may have delayed the bugs this year, so that first treatments could come as late as May 5. Treatments should be completed by May 15.

In checking treatment efficiency, farmers should examine well into treated fields from the edges the bugs may migrate from adjacent untreated fields.

And don't confuse the bluegrass plant bugs with another insect which is coming on now, the wedge-shaped leaf hoppers. The insecticides mentioned here are not highly effective against leafhoppers and thus large quantities of the latter may be found in fields treated for bluegrass plant bugs.

HANK'S INVENTION

By Lyle Pace

EVERYBODY in Platoville said Ellen Mason was a sweet girl. She was considered by many as the most beautiful young woman in town. She had money, as they all called him, did. He was Elmer Mason, president of the factory that spread itself nearly over half the town. But that wasn't up. He owned. There were other entrepreneurs. But Mason had his fingers in. So many, in fact, that the town down at the factory joked about how John P., himself, didn't know how many things he was running at the same time.

But Ellen was a sweet girl and fresh as a new peach. She'd never been serious about any of the boys in town, and some said Ellen didn't know what love was, one about anything. That is until Hank Lawson came to town and he and John P. on an idea.

Hank Lawson had come to town just to see Ellen's father, but he didn't make many changes in John P. that first day.

"I sort of give you some time to get used to the new man Mason was sort of reverting. I mean on the way you were operating on at the oldest places. Like meeting the train.

Well, the drs Hank came into town. Mr. Mason had been there in the platform watching the cars slow down and as Hank stepped off the train he motioned to John P. Mason that Elmer's father was just hanging around the station, meaning to get a hug or easy and make himself a tip.

"Say, Elmer," Hank said. "Have a quarter. How about you and me go back to the office for some beer?"

Well, John P. never had talked in a sense of humor and so he went along with him. Once he had parked on the bar and carried it down to the office he looked around the station got quite a kick out of the set up. John P. went out of sight, one of then went up to Hank and grinned

"You picked a distinguished person to buy you beer. May she was carrying your bag?"

"Mr. Mason," in this town, mister," Hank said. "Can't say as he looks very distinguished to me."

The boys chuckled over that and John P. Mason stretched his hand for a refund, and walked to the hotel.

He found out about John P. down there He was all for taking the man out of the office. But of course he didn't, because that was when he ran into Ellen. He just about knocked her down as she came out of the door of the hotel and he was on his way out with his bag.

Hank put up in the hotel for a few days. Long enough he managed to see Ellen quite a bit, too. They had a canoe on the river and went on a picnic together.

It was about two thirty on that Saturday afternoon, and the day was getting hotter. There hadn't been a cloud for weeks and all of Platoville was a million of them and it started to pour

About that time, Hank and Ellen were out on the river in a canoe. When the rain set over about an hour. Neither wasn't a thing on the river, and everybody gave them the right of way.

Just when, things got organized to drag the river and find out for sure, Ellen and Hank came walking into town.

Hank and Ellen got married in a couple of weeks. They set up housekeeping in the old Mason home. Mrs. Alice R. Fish and daughter, Mrs. Robert Harlow Lexington, were the guests of her mother, Mrs. Alice R. Fish of Carlisle last Thursday.

It takes almost 129 hours a year per cow in a 10-cow dairy herd—but only 80 hours per cow in a 30-cow herd, testers found recently in Minnesota. Labor-saving devices seem to be the answer.

COMMENT

Kay T. Fisher

For several months I have been reading and hearing about such delicacies as fried bumble bees, rattlesnake meat, fried silkworms and caterpillars just to name a few. My personal experience with these new taste treats has been limited to chocolate covered ants, offered by Kathryn Conley, a gift from H. C. & Dolly Galbraith. Needless to say I declined. Toby the more hearty type or maybe just being fifteen minutes ear it was like a delightful piece of chocolate candy with a slight 'crunch'.

After doing some research on exotic delectables I found that Japan alone exports between 70 and 80 different kinds of fancy canned foods to this country. These are not truck foods for are they found just in food specialty stores They have found their way into more than 800 chain stores, supermarkets and independent stores. from coast to coast. This business runs into the millions of dollars each year

The Japanese have been consuming these dainties for centuries and in spite of exporting them in large quantities I do not think they are a threat to the peanut and popcorn market.

Grasshoppers I understand taste like a cross between salted nuts and popcorn. As for bumblebees they are sugared and placed in soybean sauce. Only the young bees not fully grown are used If through the years you have been flirting with caterpillars you may have eaten some of the rare and unusual foods with gusto Sea urchin or sea horse paste tastes like a cheese spread being thick with added wasabi. Four shipments of smoked or broiled octopus meat tastes like salmon but is more chewy.

Quail eggs are an old gourmet specialty They are mostly yolk and taste like rendal egg yolks

Here is a new drink to serve There is a cherry blossom drink which has delightful taste and fragrance. The blossoms are preserved and have been pickled in salt and water. For single serving two or three blossoms are placed in a glass and hot water poured over them. The blossoms release the cherry fragrance This new interesting cherry blossom drink is especially popular during the summer months Happy eating

ALWAYS THE GAMBLER

By Lyle Pace

TIME town of Cedar Gulch was all sleeping when Matt Latham rode into the main and only street. It wasn't much of a town, he thought, but it would do until he got a stake again. He noticed a sign in the second café, the biggest sign in town, advertising the Half Crown. Matt knew there'd be a saloon, there always was. But supposing there hadn't been one? He felt grimy after his long ride and was anxious to sleep again on a bed. He'd been four days on the trail. Four days too long.

He registered at the room, shed a bed and arranged for the care of his horse. He found his razor, washed up and collapsed on the bed, already asleep before he hit the blanket.

He slept until eleven. When he'd dressed in his change of suit, he left the hotel and headed for the Half Crown.

It wasn't much, as bars went, he told himself. Probably not more than a hundred dollars among the lot. He took his glass and wandered over to the poker table

"A quarter better," one of the men said, tossing in a coin. "I got you licked, Jake, and you know it." He smiled good naturedly, and fingered his cards.

"Beats me," Sam said, throwing in his cards.

"King high straight," the better said.

"Jake threw down his hand "There—Can you tie that, Sam? Three aces for the first time in weeks, and he pulls a straight on me." He stood up and walked to the bar.

"I guess that breaks up the game, Tom," Sam said. "Two playin' is no fun." He paused and looked at Matt. "Say, how about you, young fella? Know how to play poker?"

Matt smiled and sat down. It was almost too easy.

Matt soon got the stakes higher and now there were bets and heavier ties in the pot. But that had been all he'd succeeded in doing. Although Matt had lost steadily in the last hour, so far no total procedure, both Tom and Sam were still raising to the last.

"Well, guess I'll get back to the ranch," Sam said finally, sorry.

"Yep." He turned to Matt. "Thanks, stranger. Thanks for the contribution."

The two men stepped out the door and disappeared into the street. Matt slumped in his chair, and quite before realized it had just happened.

"Welcome to the Half Crown, mister," a friendly voice said behind him. Matt let him in his chair, looked up at a tall, heavy set man who was grinning widely The big man extended his hand. "Name's Morgan. Jeffery P. Morgan, owner and manager. At your service, Mr.—"

Matt got to his feet and took the hand. "Latham," he said. "Call me Matt."

"All right, Matt. How about a drink on the house." He guided Matt to the bar.

When the drinks were brought, Morgan lifted his glass. "To your health, Mr. Latham. I mean Matt."

Matt paid down the glass and set it on the bar. "How was the game?" He nodded to the table. "Get your money's worth?"

Matt shrugged. "Live and learn," he said. "Pretty nearly cleaned me out."

Morgan chuckled. "Sure I could have told you that. Nobody in their right mind will play poker with Sam and Tom Brewsley." Morgan's eyes narrowed slightly. "No professional gambler will, anyway."

"And what does that mean?" Matt said.

"It means," Morgan went on, "that you just got took by the sharpest pair of poker players ever to put boots under a table. Why, those guys don't even travel around any more. Just stay here and wait for suckers like you."
