COMMENT

Kay T. Fisher

Have you ever thought about how the herbs get to the market? I hadn't until several weeks ago I read about an herb expert right here in Kentucky. His specialty was the long smooth roots of the Ginseng plant which is a medicinal herb. There is a just right time to dig this plant. "When the berries are red and the leaves yellow, and just before the last frost" A good day of digging will yield as much as $10 including herbs such as may apple, wild ginger, and lady slipper. And will net close to $500 for the year.
While I was in Virginia I saw two herbs or weeds growing that I have not seen in Kentucky. One was Cross-weed or Boneset which grows in low areas and the stems are boiled to make a strong "tea." The other, Balsam also known as Life Everlasting or Rabbit tobacco. I was told that boys used to dry the blossom of this plant to smoke in "roll your own" cigarets, and take the leaves to use for chewing tobacco.
Since the Patent Medicine man is a thing of the past, most of the old fashioned herbs once well known and on the shelves of every Apothecary shop are classed as weeds and the farmer is left the task of ridding his pasture land of these once commercial plants
