Local conservationists urge farmers to use agricultural practices

Local conservationists urge farmers to use agricultural practices. A group of conservationists in Nicholas County are urging farmers to use agricultural practices that will conserve soil and water. The group includes the Nicholas County Soil Conservation District Board of Supervisors, the Nicholas County Agricultural Conservation Club, and the Nicholas County Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee. They are urging farmers to use practices such as strip cropping, contour plowing, and tree planting to prevent soil erosion and water runoff. The group is also urging farmers to use fertilizers and pesticides judiciously to protect the soil and water from contamination. The group is holding a series of meetings and field days to educate farmers on these practices. They are also offering technical assistance to farmers who need help in adopting these practices. The group is hoping that these efforts will help to conserve the soil and water resources of Nicholas County for the future.
