Fall vegetables add zest to meals

Crisp, cool days stimulate appetites, and old-fashioned vegetables, in greatest supply at this season, have distinct appeal, whether they come from the home garden or the market.

Cauliflower with its white or creamy-white head surrounded by fresh, green leaves is in greatest supply. Size has little relation to quality, a large or small heads being equally desirable. However, flower clusters that spread apart and become "ricey" brownish, or spotted in appearance, are not desirable, and the vegetable may lack its crisp, fresh flavor, warn UK marketing specialists.

The green leaves of cauliflower may be used also. Cook them as other greens are cooked, or serve them with the cauliflower. Broken into flowerets, cauliflower is delightful when seasoned and uncooked or used in a tossed salad. One pound makes about three half-cup cooked servings.

Sweet potatoes are of two general types. The early-crop variety, or yams, are moist and have a high sugar content. They are more easily bruised than those marketed later in the season and should be handled carefully.

The later variety, or Jerseys, are dry and mealy. Good sweet potatoes, including yams, are smooth, well shaped and firm. Those that are badly misshapen, or show growth cracks or injury, may have consider able waste.

Sweet potatoes are excellent sources of vitamin A. One pound makes three servings.

Squash, mainly acorn and some hubbard, is generally available at this season. Winter squash has a hard rind and deep yellow flesh. As other yellow vegetables, it is rich in vitamin A.

Fresh turnip greens, kale and broccoli, and dark-green vegetables, are excellent sources of vitamins A and C, and also calcium. Wise and fortunate are the families who grow them in their home gardens.

When broccoli is bought in the market, it should have tight, dark-green heads with fresh-looking leaves. The heads are groups of tiny buds, tight and flowerless when they are gathered at the desirable tender stage. The stems and leaves may be eaten as well as the clusters of buds, but longer cooking should be allowed, particularly for the stems.

Farmers could increase income with nut crops

Frankfort, Nov. 6 — Kentucky has one natural resource which is largely unnoticed and undeveloped—the nut tree.

So says the State Agricultural Development Division, which is endeavoring to create a greater industrial market for the Commonwealth's agricultural output. For this purpose the division, a unit of the Economic Development Department was created in 1956 by Gov. A. B. Chandler

Nut trees have played an important role in Kentucky's history, beginning with the first settlers who lived off nut-fattened game and the nut fruit itself, says a booklet published by the division. The publication, "Nut Tree Crops in Kentucky," adds:

Kentucky has much rich hillside land which is classified as wasteland. When this is used for tree nut production, it yields a cash crop and comes under good conservation practices.

If the same 20 million pounds of black walnuts produced in Kentucky each year were harvested, they would return farmers about $1,000,000 in additional income. Nut tree development would add to diversification which has raised farm income during recent years. Kentucky's 200,000 farms have an average of six nut trees a farm. If their output was harvested it would provide farmers with enough income to pay all their county and state real property taxes.

The booklet, available from the department, lists principal users of tree nuts, prices paid, market outlook, growing instructions, and descriptions of the various kinds of nuts produced in Kentucky.

The information was compiled by William L. Wiesman, agricultural economist and assistant director of the division. Thomas Zerger Tennessee Valley Authority district forester, Spencer Chase, secretary of the Northern Nut Growers Assn., Knoxville, Tenn., and W. D. Armstrong, horticulturist Western Kentucky Experiment Sub-station, Princeton.

To search for diabetics

Finding unknown diabetics and helping them to live longer, more useful lives is the goal of the annual Diabetes Detection and Education Drive the week of Nov. 16-22," according to Robert J. Hoffman, M.D., South Ft. Mitchell, chairman of the Kentucky State Medical Association's Diabetes Committee.

Sponsored by the KSMA in cooperation with the American Diabetes Association, the drive will be held during the period officially proclaimed as Diabetes Week in Kentucky by Governor A. B. Chandler

This seven previous public service campaigns, more than 100 persons who were unaware they had diabetes learned of their condition. These individuals now have the necessary knowledge to enable them to use the proper precautions," Doctor Hoffman said.

Every physician, hospital and laboratory in the state has been asked to cooperate in the drive by giving a free urine sugar test to anyone requesting it. All Kentuckians are urged to take advantage of this drive which is unique in that it is strictly a public service effort, and not a fund raising campaign.

Kentucky leads in quality of milk supplies

Kentucky again leads other participating states in the number of communities with high quality milk supplies, according to Public Health Reports, a professional magazine published by the U. S. Public Health Service.

The "Milk Sanitation Honor Roll" in the magazine list 283 cities and 87 counties in 24 states. Of these, 48 cities and 26 counties are in Kentucky. Four of Kentucky's cities and their four counties are listed as having both raw and pasteurized milk, while the remaining 44 cities and 22 counties have all market milk pasteurized. Last year, Kentucky led 19 other states with 36 cities and 19 counties.

County-wide milk sanitation ordinances based on recommendations of the Public Health Service have been adopted by all the communities listed. These cities and counties have had a rating of 90 percent or more from July, 1956, through June, 1958. Ratings, made by state health departments, are based on how well each dairy and milk plant in the community meets essential sanitary standards.

Gone are the tailgates

Passing another old tailgate relic on the Barterville pike where my grandfather Peter lived for a number of years (nothing but a memory to mark the location of the old tailgate to many of Barterville's younger generation) we were reminded of the days when we and my dad married back in 1885.

Just a few yards further on is the old rock bridge (where a sign today informs the passerby they are entering the little town with the big heart") and is where the wagon train camped overnight when my father's father moved bag, bag gage, wife and eleven children of to Nicholas County, settling at Millersburg where he built the L & N railroad was built from Paris to Maysville.

My dad was a barefoot boy of seven when this move from Wyoming, Bath county, took place.

Well the Millers and I who lived on, turned the corner at beautiful Forest Retreat, looked at the old Tavern, which has undergone some changes, and passed dozens of comfortable country homes where pale blue smoke curled skyward and hundreds of white chickens roamed about yards and hillsides.

The Road to Yesterday and Back: . . .

By Nellie Crump

Last Wednesday was one of the most enjoyable days I've had in many a season—or is it that I might be getting a mite childish—just a smidgen—as I'll be 80 years young (?) Anyway, it was a day long to be remembered, one spent with my relative, Mrs. Hamer Miller, while the Mr. had to be away on business. Just the two of us, yet she set before me a dinner fit for a queen. It had been a long, long time since I had been with Pearlie for so many hours, recalling childhood happenings of the kind one never forgets.

The Unexpected

Returning home a little earlier than expected from his day's activities, meant I thought that Hamer was about ready to bring me home—but no! Puttering about the house a bit he came to the door and said, "I have to go to Barterville, would you girls like to go along for the ride?" Would we? Our sweaters were half on by this time. I seldom go beyond the city limits, so the very thought of such a trip was an unexpected treat.

Around the first curve in the road was a modern home now in place of the old tollgate house; we climbed the hill and were in the little city of Barterville Little is left besides stores to tell of the once thriving country village. The cemetery is still one of the most beautiful spots in the area. Dead to be found anywhere The school house and church silhouetted against a cloudy sky stand as silent reminders of a great and happy past.

Stopping at a barn on the left, we had reached our destination and Magistrate Miller went in and brought a 'stick' of his crop of tobacco out to the car for us womenfolk to see —just a sample of what is inside, you know. Several cars were parked there and a few around a gas pump The post office serving a large and busy community still does its stuff from day to day. Somewhere around Hamer got a loaf of bread.

Turning the car around at this corner, we took off on the new Mt. Moriah highway, new to me anyway; for many a time I've walked over the old dirt road, with eggs from uncle Jim, Mart Hollar's place to the Barterville store and gossipfest.

The new road certainly has changed the contour of the earth in that neck of the woods. Possibly the R.P.D. service is partly responsible too.

Gone are the Scenes

It was getting late and we had to hurry. We could not find the location of the old Mt. Moriah church where I had often attended church and Sunday School on meetin' day and listened with interest to "Aunt Laura" Ramey, a devout old lady, "pray without ceasing" for more than an hour at a time, gifted in prayer as she spoke.

The spell was broken when we rolled out into heavy traffic on Highway 68, but we made it back to town without any trouble, thanks to an alert driver.

I would like to go back again about next October and eat picnic lunch under the cedars and shumates—and maybe see if any of the large trees still stand with their crude but sincere carvings of arrows, hearts and forget-me-nots.

I feel quite sure I saw my uncle's old home, minus white paint and the old log barn.

Here's hoping you like this true story that I shall remember with pleasure always, although with a lump in the throat.
