Direct distance dialing operation begins Sunday at Winchester

Kentucky's first large scale Direct Distance Dialing operation goes into effect November 2 at Winchester.

Sam H. Ridgway, General Commercial Manager for Southern Bell Telephone and Telegraph Company in Kentucky said the conversion from manual to dial service was accomplished at a cost of $2.160.000.

With the installation of DDD, one and two party subscribers in Winchester will be able to dial about 40,000,000 telephones in 866 exchanges throughout the United States without the assistance of an operator.

All station-to-station calls, with some exceptions, will be dialed direct when the new service starts. Calls such as person-to-person, collect, credit card calls and calls placed at coin telephones will continue to be handled by an operator.

Four party users will be assisted by an operator in completing their long distance calls.

Automatic Billing

An automatic billing machine known as Automatic Message Accounting works in conjunction with DDD operation. The machine records the number of the person placing the call and the number in the distant city called and times the call—all automatically.
