Creeping nightmare

Washington columnist William S. Browne writes: Federal expenditures are becoming vast and so diffuse in purpose as to raise a serious question whether any President or Congress will be able within a few years to control any budget. May not interest events, or an illustration manifestly honest recession, or external events instantly requiring vast outlays in the cold war, become the real future masters of the budget?

How long will it work?

Some politicians seek to cry public favor by advocating reduced income taxes for the low brackets. In the next breath they advocate higher state or federal gasoline taxes which will for the low income taxpayer probably mean an increase in his total take as a car and gasoline are a necessity for the average worker to reach his job.

Right Hand Page-Back Page

It's a Foolish Argument to present or defend. It is not so much some fatal conceit. It is not so much the level of present spending that they fear. It is the possibility that men may lose to the robot power effectively to control spending.
