Fall-garden work due right now

Only about 75 days left until the first killing frost in autumn—and persons wanting fall-garden produce should be planting now, says George Marlowe, UK Cooperative Extension Service vegetable specialist.

Short-season and fall-vegetable crops should be planted now, he says; general deadline is mid-July. Use either seed or transplants. Fall cauliflower, broccoli and cabbage plants should be planted only if irrigation is available.

If seed is used, plant deeper than usual. Marlowe recommends digging the furrow, watering it well, then planting the seed. If the furrow is dug, seed planted and then watered, the soil packs and poor germination will result.

Pick crops that mature within the time limit of 90 days: beans, beets and chard take from 45 to 60 days; carrots, kale, sweet corn and turnips, 60 to 75 days; rutabaga, 75 to 90 days. Such rutabaga, incidentally, will be small sized but large enough to store.

One of Kentucky's most unappreciated vegetables is kale, Marlowe says. It is high in vitamins, grows well in this state, tastes even better after the first frost and will over-winter and start growing in the spring.

Home fires took the lives of 6,000 farm and city people last year. Nearly one-third of the fatalities were under 15 years of age.

Farm animals account for many farm accidents. Check and repair livestock equipment and keep children away from potentially dangerous animals.

Century Club off to good start in drive for UK Alumni center
by Sue McMauley

The Century Club will present the University of Kentucky with its biggest centennial birthday present—a new alumni center—in 1965.

The center is one goal of the Century Club, organized earlier this summer by the Alumni Association to prepare for the University's 100th anniversary. Organizers hope for a minimum membership of 500 persons who would give $250,000 during the next five years by pledging $100 annually. Membership in the club is not limited to UK graduates but is open to anyone interested in improving facilities of the University.

To date, after a month and a half of nationwide campaigning among UK alumni, 135 members have been enrolled.

Some Objectives

The alumni center is to be used for alumni offices, as an on-campus meeting place for industry, for student conferences and interviews and for alumni and University functions. Members of the club also hope:

1. To continue Alumni Loyalty Fund Scholarships for outstanding students. A full $2,800, for four-year scholarship program is offered every fall.

2. To continue the four annual $500 faculty awards for outstanding research and scholarship. This faculty recognition program was featured in an article appearing in the July 17 issue of Science, a national technical publication.

3. To provide financial assistance to student organizations of distinction and merit.

4. To give financial assistance to faculty members so that they may attend professional meetings where research papers and addresses are being given.

5. To provide research facilities not easily obtainable through usual sponsoring agencies.

6. To continue sponsoring the annual Alumni Seminars which bring outstanding people to the campus.

(Speakers for the seminar held this summer included Anthony Lewis, Supreme Court reporter for the New York Times and Pulitzer Prize winner for his reporting of national news; Malcolm Moos, administrative assistant to President Eisenhower, and Rupert L. Frazier, 1919 graduate of UK and for 31 years
