

Cavood Calls Basketball

by CAWOOD LEDFORD

Kentucky's basketball players are wearing vests this year. It's not that the "Wizards" are trying to be "cool cats," but if all goes well, the Kentucky team may resemble a group of kangaroos by the end of the season.

The Wizards are undergoing an experiment. If it works, their veterans' leadership, Adolph Rupp, may have his finest rebounding unit in 1940. The Vest is just that. A plain-looking, make-shift "c'n's a's" vest with pockets all over the front and back. In these pockets are fitted five pound lead weights. Wearing this strange-looking contraption, the tall boys do a series of exercises each day. The number of knees, or kneads, are increased, but from time to time more weights are added. Right now, it varies from four pounds, 175 pound, Harry Rupp to sixty pounds, for 200-that pound, Limestone. It's so early to tell, but Rupp's "Wizards" are looking like a hand of high-lumpers by the last month of the season.

They got it started at Iowa, where coaches claimed that weight increased, it's jumping height, by 12 inches per man. At 97 couldn't dunk the ball, but now, on just 125 pounds, the vest added nine inches to his jumping ability. Dr. W. M. Maxfield, the University's campus brace shop, says the apparatus isn't currently in use every day.
