Consider cost of serving to determine best meats

Lower prices on all cuts and (see Good buys can be found in this column)

The best buy in any meat should be determined by the number of servings to be served, rather than the original price per pound, says Mrs. Lettie J. Jasper, UK Extension specialist in marketing and consumer education.

Some pork cuts yield much more edible meat per pound than others, she says, as she suggests the following guide for number of servings:

Steak, one and a half servings per pound; pork chops, two servings; whole ham and loin, two and a half servings per pound; corned beef, one and a half servings per pound.

Mrs. Jasper calls particular attention to the shoulder pork roast called Boston Butt as being a good buy. It is a chunky, almost boneless square of pork weighing from 4 to 6 pounds. Of all the pork cuts, it has the highest percentage of lean meat because boneless.

It is often sold below its value. Steaks cut be from the end of a large roast.
