Green County Gets Greener

Where in Kentucky is agricultural progress more evident than in Green County? Twenty-five years ago when I first worked there as an Extension Agent, I was distressed to see so many acres of hillside land plowed, planted, and then left exposed to the ravages of erosion. Through the aid of the State and Federal Government, we have now over 100 farms under a soil conservation program. This program has not only improved the soil but has also increased the productivity of the farms. The big reduction in erosion was just the beginning of the changes that were taking place. The hillside land that was once converted to a farm is now a forest. The soil is now protected from erosion and the farm is now a forest. The soil is now protected from erosion and the farm is now a forest.

Onion treatment will help lewans

Treatment of lewans to get rid of wild onions actually will be done now, says James Hermon, Kentucky Experiment Station weed specialist, before the new plants have started developing the underground bulbs from which they "come back" each year.
