Do not stuff turkeys for the home freezer

Lexington, Ky.—Don't stuff your Christmas turkey until time to roast it! Why not, Elizabeth Helton, UK Extension specialist in foods and nutrition, explains why you should not stuff the turkey and freeze it at home for later use.

"Many homemakers have been asking us this question," Miss Helton says. "Since frozen stuffed turkey can be bought at grocery stores, homemakers wonder why not freeze their own. Here's the reason."

These turkeys on sale at stores have been frozen and stuffed mechanically, she points out. The work is done in cold temperatures and the turkey and dressing are handled very little. When turkeys are stuffed at home, the work is usually done in a warm kitchen. No matter how careful the homemaker is, she must handle the turkey and dressing; bacteria can be brought in.

In the home freezer, stuffed turkeys freeze slowly. Even in the coldest part of the freezer, the dressing will not be completely frozen for at least 24 hours. Bacteria multiply rapidly unless stopped by freezing. Enough bacteria could develop before the dressing is completely frozen to make it dangerous to eat, according to Miss Helton.

Commercially stuffed turkeys are frozen solid in a very short time, she reports. They are frozen in a circulating blast of very cold air (about -20 degrees F.), which gives much faster chilling and freezing than home freezers. For an ample, in winter you get cold much faster when the wind is blowing than when it is still. In the same way, the circulating air in commercial freezers freeze much faster than home freezers. Bacteria do not have the chance to grow.

You may want to start preparing the stuffing a few days before Christmas, but refrigerate or freeze the dry ingredients and broth separately until time to use the stuffing. Turkey that is not stuffed may be frozen safely, of course, but do not stuff your turkey ahead of time and freeze it; stuffed turkey will not freeze fast enough in the home freezer to be safe, Miss Helton warns.

COMMENT

Kay T. Fisher

Mary Lou Campbell not only answered my question of last week regarding the change in the design of the fifty-cent piece, but also gave me additional information regarding some of our other coins.

The first United States coin of a regular series to carry the portrait of an actual individual was the Lincoln penny first issued in 1909. Since that time there has been the Washington quarter in 1932, the Jefferson nickle in 1938, the Franklin Roosevelt dime in 1946 and the Franklin half dollar in 1948.

During 1943 the only pennies minted in the United States were zinc-coated steel. This was to conserve copper for war defense purposes. Or so the Government said. However, according to the head of the U. S. Mint, they are actually bronze. So someone can figure that out.

Since money and weather are here to stay, I can't ignore the hail storm of Monday night. Miss Nellie Crump called Tuesday morning to tell me there was not only hail of regular proportion but "slabs of ice, thin as paper, but at least an inch square." While I was asking about that she told me this was not the first time. In 1940 hail came down in squares
