State adopts brake fluid safety act

Frankfort, April—A hydraulic brake fluid inspection law was among safety legislation passed by the 1960 session of the Kentucky General Assembly.

Effective Sept. 1, the law is modeled after uniform vehicle code specifications. It requires that every manufacturer who sells, offers for sale, produces, or uses any hydraulic brake fluid in Kentucky submit a laboratory analysis report from an independent and qualified laboratory to the Kentucky Department of Public Safety before Sept. 1

The lab report must show conformity of the product to be approved with the SAE 70 R-1 standards. Manufacturers whose products are approved by the Department of Public Safety will be awarded a certificate. There is no fee involved.

The new law requires that all brake fluid containers be labeled to show conformity with the specifications. Many manufacturers already do this type of labeling.

No hydraulic brake can be sold, used, or produced in Kentucky after September 1, 1960 unless it has been approved by the Department of Public Safety.

Discussions between Western powers continues, in preparation for the May Summit Conference. The issues—a ban on nuclear test, disarmament, people, and in turn having them get to know us in a powerful antidote to cold war poisons.

Such exchanges as the fairs and exhibits, ours to Russia and theirs to America, are particularly helpful. We are also encouraged to read that the Russians have opened new travel routes to foreign motorists "to go it alone." The Russians have published a directory of its transportation routes, for the first time, so that out-of-country motorists will be able to travel on approved routes without guides or supervision. The roads will cover such points of interest as farm lands, timber lands, universities, natural history and art museums, theaters, cathedrals and castles.

We have long enjoyed the Russian Ballet and symphony. Now, we find the Russians have received the Broadway show "My Fair Lady" by selling out all tickets even before it opened.

Of course the cultural exchange, while helping to cement relationships between our nations, is not enough.

Agreements Must Be Kept

The lessons of our past dealings with the Soviet show that we must carefully appraise any commitments they offer. Agreements must be sought, for the gravity of world problems permits no other course. But agreements which have no permanent meaning can solve nothing.

The Russians must be made to understand that under normal code, a good faith commitment does not vary with varying circumstances. The failure of Russian leaders to abide by this honored and simple precept in the past requires us to demand concrete evidence of good faith—perhaps some condition precedent to performance on the part of Russia — before our commitments become binding.

Failures in the past to reach accord on Russia's defaults on previous contracts should not deter us in our efforts in seeking satisfactory resolutions of our differences. The world situation does not permit that. Moreover, some compromise must come from both sides if solution is to be had at all; this is the price of establishing a peaceful world in which to pursue our national aims. But we have learned that it is necessary to insist on safeguards to insure the sanctity of international agreements.

Education For The Blind

The wealth of knowledge the nation's blind children can receive through braille and audio materials may be increased for wider distribution, if a humanitarian bill introduced by our friend and colleague, Congressman Frank Burke of Louisville, is adopted.

The bill, dealing with the education of all blind children would improve the educational and instructional services available through the American Printing House for the Blind. In addition, it would authorize an increase in the appropriation from the present $400,000 to $1 million, actually a small sum considering its vast national significance, so that books and materials are made available wherever and when ever they are needed.

The American Printing House for the Blind, as you may know, is located in Louisville. It was chartered in 1858 by the Kentucky Legislature. For more than a century it has been internationally renowned for furnishing "talking books" and braille materials for use in every Congressional district in the United States.

Beginning in 1879 the Federal Government has participated in the distribution of the books to all blind children.

Development progress in KU served area reflected in company report

The progress in industrial, rural, commercial and community development in the area served by Kentucky Utilities Company and the company's contribution to this progress are reflected in a report just released of a KU. competition.

The contest, which pitted the 1959 development efforts and accomplishments of the company's four operating divisions and 27 districts against one another, served as a measure in gaging various phases of the area's growth and progress.

A total of 27 new industries located in the KU. service area and 28 existing industries expanded their operations. These industries will provide 2,700 new jobs and $10,950,000 in new annual payrolls. KU. industrial engineers, as members of Kentucky's "Industrial Team", and local company personnel assisted in various activities which attracted the industrial newcomers and helped local industry' decisions to locate plants.

The large proportion of plant expansions is viewed as a strong endorsement of the area as a desirable place for industry since it reflects long-term satisfaction with the factors which make up the industrial climate of the plant communities.

As examples of the preliminary work necessary to put communities in a competitive position to attract industry and the progress of KU-served communities is becoming "ready for industry," the contest results showed 70 communities with active industrial development organizations, 40 with industrial sites under option and 25 with complete data files giving information which industrial prospects require. Local KU. personnel received credits in the contest for assuming the responsibility of having the data files and option records complete and current and of assisting the development organizations.

Forty-five KU-served towns submitted scrapbooks in the Kentucky Chamber of Commerce Community Development Contest.

Company farm service advisers took part in 65 rural development meetings during the year and helped form new rural development organization in McCracken and Robertson Counties.

In the field of commercial development, company-served towns sported 387 new store fronts and interior modernizations, many of them with the active help of KU. commercial service advisers. These men took part in 87 Main Street Modernization meetings and sponsored 94 showings of modernization films.

KU. home economists and home service representatives conducted 2,545 demonstrations of electrical equipment before Homemakers Clubs, schools, and other groups.

RESIGNS PASTORATE
