100 YEARS AGO

Illness, Bad Weather Add To War's Misery

By Lon K. Sapp.
"A Tennessee hog pen would be a most comfortable place to live in these times," a Confederate officer wrote to his family 100 years ago this week.

The officer was lodged on a mountain in what is now southeastern West Virginia, and as he wrote, rain poured down around him. Confederate soldiers were miserably and starved at the time. Many were dangerously ill; many more were hungry.

The Confederates in western Virginia were meeting an opposition that failed thousands of soldiers on both sides throughout the war. And this week 100 years ago, when the shooting war had died down to minor skirmishes, disease and bad weather here in restlessly on both sides.

The officer in western Virginia who wrote of Tennessee hog pens was not the only one to complain. In the same camp Robert Lee, to become the Confederate's No. 1 leader, also lamented the weather.

20 Days of Rain
Lee had come to western Virginia in late July, and his first 20 days in the area were 20 days of rain. "I remain here," he wrote his wife in mid-August. "Has been all day, last night, day before, and day before that."

Meades swept through the camp bringing news of the situation. Supplies were being brought forward in the trucks. The Confederates were not to stand at all night, fearing they would be taken by surprise.

But the Yankees were having the same trouble. They were cutting a movement down the mountain. The Confederates were cutting a movement down the mountain. The Confederates were cutting a movement down the mountain.
