Employment taxes increase Jan. 1

U. S. Internal Revenue Service today reminded employers of the following increases in the rates of Federal employment taxes relating to retirement, disability, and employment which become effective January 1, 1962.

The employer tax and the employee tax under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act will each increase from 3 percent to 3¼ percent. These are the social security taxes which are due from employers of one or more employees. Employers are required to withhold employee tax at the rate of 3 ¼ percent, from wages paid after December 31, 1961, regardless of when the wages are earned.

The employer tax under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act will increase from 3.1 percent to 3.3 percent. This is the Federal unemployment tax which is due for any calendar year from any employer who has 4 or more employees on at least one day of each 20 calendar weeks in the year. The increase applies to wages paid after December 31, 1961, regardless of when the wages are earned.

The social security tax due from self-employed individuals on their income from self-employment will increase from 4.5 percent to 4.7 percent for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1961.

The taxes under the Railroad Retirement Tax Act will be increased on compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1961. The employer tax and employee tax will each increase from 6¼ percent to 7¼ percent. The employee representative tax will increase from 13½ percent to 14½ percent.
