Tenth of earth's surface still lies under glaciers

Glaciers that covered much of the earth during the Ice Age left lasting effects in climate and geography.

Four times the great ice sheets ground down from the polar regions. First Clnada and Scandinavia, then parts of Europe and the United States were submerged in the inexorable flows, miles thick in places. The ice extended over 28 percent of the earth's land area, scouring the face of the earth and driving animal life before it.

The relentless force carved out the face of North America, the National Geographic Society says. Glaciers formed the Great Lakes and gouged deep valleys. They picked up vast quantities of soil and rock and turned the debris into hills and ridges. The country's greatest rivers were born from melting waters at the edges of the great ice fields.

The last major ice sheet may have retreated only 10,000 years ago.

Formed From Snow

Today a tenth of the earth's surface still lies under ponderous ice. Antarctica and Greenland account for most of it, but small, mountain glaciers glisten in many parts of the world. Any local climatic changes, such as greater snowfall and lower temperatures, affect these small ice fields.

Glaciers are still being formed by snow accumulating on gentle slopes. Weight presses the lower layers into clear, granular ice. Like frozen rivers they flow down mountain sides.

Glaciers that meet the sea calve treacherous icebergs. The giant blocks break off and follow wandering currents deep into shipping lanes.

Weather conditions over the last century suggest a warming trend. The icecaps on Antarctica and Greenland appear to be shrinking.

However, some scientists believe that the earth may be approaching the peak of a warm interglacial period. Recent studies show that some isolated glaciers are actually advancing, while other are growing thicker.

The Coprmander Glacier in British Columbia has traveled 800 feet in six years. The two largest glaciers in Norway are again on the march, though both had shrunk considerably before 1950.

Naturalists at Glacier National Park in Montana are pleased with chilliec weather there. Some of their chief attractions were melting away, but are now making a comeback.

Poll to pick favorite hymns

Every reader of The Mercury is invited to write the name of his favorite hymn or gospel song on the ballot printed elsewhere in this paper. In appreciation, The Mercury and Christian Herald will give each respondent the inspiring miniature book, "Hymn Thoughts for the Day," by Bill McVey. Our local hymn poll is an important part of the nationwide survey. The National Newspapers Hymn Poll is being conducted by newspapers in cities of all sizes in every state. Its purpose is to find out which hymns The Mercury readers (and Americans everywhere) enjoy singing and hearing—as well as to encourage hymn singing in homes and churches throughout the country.

Each vote submitted in the coast-to-coast survey will be tabulated by Audience Analysts, Inc., a leading independent research organization. The Mercury will publish a list of favorites in this area and compare them with national results.

Please use pencil or ball-point pen to print the name of your favorite hymn on the ballot Mail it today so your vote is sure to be counted. Counting of the ballots will begin on July 25.
