100 YEARS AGO

Federals Beaten Again In Bal's Bluff Attack

By Lon K. Savage

The mismanagement, confusion and inefficiency that caused the tremendous rout of federal troops at Ball Run in late July cropped up again 100 years ago this week in another federal attack near Washington.

Again, the federals were beaten — and beaten badly. Nearly a thousand Union soldiers became casualties when they were cornered on a bluff overlooking the Potomac. There, just 30 miles northwest of the national capital, they were captured or shot down by the scores; many drowned trying to swim to safety; their commander,—a national hero and former United States Senator—was shot through the heart and killed. And when it was all over, a hue and cry went up in the North just like the hue and cry which had followed Bull Run.

No Battle Planned

This battle, unlike the one at Bull Run, had not been planned. George B. McClellan recently had suggested to Gen. Charles P. Stone of Pennsylvania that "perhaps a slight demonstration" along the Potomac might draw off Harrison's Island, ascended the 70 feet of Ball's Bluff and made their way to nearby Leesburg. They then ran into Confederates and retired to the bluff under fire.

Meanwhile, boatload after boatload crossed the river, and the men took position around the bluff. By mid-afternoon, Baker, himself, crossed and took command of 1,700 men.

By this time also, Confederate Gen. Nathan "Shanks" Evans, with an equal number of men, had taken strong positions in the hills surrounding the bluff, and his musket fire was taking its toll on the Confederates.

Confederates Charge

Late in the afternoon, the 13th, 17th and 18th Mississippi and the Eighth Virginia charged furiously, and Baker's defenses crumbled. Trying to rally to his left, Baker, himself, fell under Confederate fire. The New Yorkers and New Englanders tumbled headlong down the bluff, and so many crowded onto one of the boats that it was swamped and the men floundered in the water.

From there on Evans' job was little more than a mop up. More than 700 Yankees surrendered; 49 were killed and 158 were wounded (one of them being a young Massachusetts lieutenant named Oliver Wendell Holmes). The Southerners had lost only 33 killed and 115 wounded.

That was far from the end of it however, Federal fury at the loss fell upon poor, innocent General Stone, and within four months he would be imprisoned as the scapegoat, his military career ruined from then until the end of his life.

Next week: Confederate sailors tried for piracy.

The Upper Room publishes special edition

Honoring the Third Assembly of the World Council of Churches which meets in New Delhi, India, November 18, through December 6, 1961, The Upper Room, world-wide interdenominational daily devotional guide, has published a special edition in the official languages of the assembly: French, German and English, and Hindi, a language of India.

The devotional message, prayer, Bible reference, and thought-for-the-day for each of the nineteen days of the assembly—all taken from the regular issue of publication—are printed in these four languages. Some of the content has been written by representatives of the world church.

The cover of the issue features a painting, Madonna of the Mountain, by Lalit Mash, Indian painter and a prelude to color. The Upper Room is published in 32 languages and 30 editions with 2 new other language editions now in process.

The center spread of the issue features native Indian flowers in color. The Upper Room is published in 32 languages and 30 editions with 2 new other language editions now in process.

An estimated 10 million persons read it daily over the world.

Tips for storing cheese at home

A cheese to suit every taste and occasion — with the many different kinds of cheese on today's market, you'll find a cheese to go with most any food and a cheese to satisfy most anyone's taste. Cheese is an especially good buy now because October marks a special promotion by the cheese industry, notes Elizabeth Helton, UK Extension specialist in foods and nutrition.

When you buy one of the many kinds of cheese, you may wonder just what is the best way to store it. Should you keep it in or out of the refrigerator? Can it be stored in the home freezer? How can you protect it from mold?

One good guide as to where and how to keep cheese is found at your food market, Miss Helton points out. How is it stored there? Many shapes and sizes of cheese packages are in refrigerated showcases, put these varieties of cheese in your refrigerator when you take them home. Cheese spreads sell from market shelves; these do not need to be refrigerated until they are opened—but, after you open them, keep them in the refrigerator.

Soft, unripened cheese—such as cottage, cream, or Neufchatel—spoils easily and should be used within a few days after you buy it. Ripened or cured cheese keeps well in the refrigerator for several weeks if you protect it from drying out and from mold.

Leave the original wrapper or cover on the cheese if possible, Miss Helton suggests. Cover the cut surface closely with wax paper, foil or plastic wrapping material to keep the surface from drying out. If you want to store large pieces of cheese for quite some time, you can dip the surface in hot paraffin. Small pieces can be completely rewrapped.

Cheese that has an aromatic or strong odor, such as Limburger, should be stored in a tightly-closed jar or other very tight container. Because such cheeses are fast-curing, they are best used within a reasonable time after you buy them, she says.

Some kinds of cheese can be frozen successfully for as long as six months. These are: Brick, Cheddar, Edam, Gouda, Muenster, Port au Saint, Swiss, Provolone, Mozzarella, and Camembert. Other types of cheese become crumbly and mealy when frozen, so only those listed should be put in the freezer.

For freezing the kinds of cheese named above, wrap the cheeses tightly in freezer foil or other moisture-proof freezer wrapping. Press the wrap closely against the surface of the cheese to force out air; then freeze immediately at zero degrees or below. Freeze only small pieces (a pound or less), not over an inch thick. Small packages, such as those in which Camembert sells, can be frozen just as they come from the store.

Mold that may form on natural cheese is not harmful and can be easily scraped off the surface, Miss Helton says. The particular mold inside such cheeses as Blue, Gorgonola, Roquefort, or Stilton is part of
