New Skills for Kentucky Youth

A statewide network of vocational schools in Kentucky offers practical training in a wide variety of trades and technical fields to high school students, out-of-school youth and adults from this state and other states.

The largest of the schools are completely operated and maintained by the State Department of Education—Mayo State Vocational School at Prestonsburg, Northern Kentucky State Vocational School at Covington, and West Kentucky State Vocational School at Paducah.

There are also 11 area vocational schools, supervised and financed by the State, but administered by local boards of education. Mayo also operates four off-campus extensions, with a fifth under construction. The Harlan extension is operated by the Harlan Area Schools.

Most of the vocational schools offer general industrial and trades courses such as auto mechanics, woodworking, office practice, drafting and machine shop. In addition, many specialized courses are offered, including practical nursing, cosmetology and air-conditioning.

West Kentucky has training for commercial rock bolting. Mayo and Harlan offer special courses in mining mechanics, and apprentice plumbing is taught at Northern.

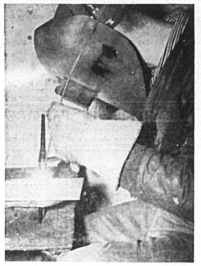
The 20 vocational schools and extensions now have a full- and part-time enrollment of about 14,000, but Wendell F. Butler, State superintendent of public instruction, estimates that expansion now taking place at several schools will allow enrollment to increase by 25 per cent within the next two years.

Present expansion plans include complete relocation of the Northern Kentucky Vocational School at Erlanger, and the building of new vocational schools to house the area schools at Hazard, Harlan, Ashland, Somerset, Madisonville and Valley Station (Jefferson County), to cost approximately $300,000 each.

In addition, Butler said, bids are in process of being let for a new $250,000 science building at Mayo and a new $285,000 trades building at West Kentucky State, with completion scheduled before the end of the 1962 calendar year.

Fees charged at the vocational schools range from a minimum of $1 for evening extension courses to $15 a month for full-time pre-employment courses. Full-time students attend classes six hours a day, five days a week. Courses take 11 to 22 months to complete. West Kentucky and Mayo have dormitories for full-time students living on campus.

The other area vocational schools are located at Bowling Green, Lexington, Owensboro, Paducah and Louisville. The off-campus extensions operated by Mayo are at Jeffrey Millard (both in Pike County), Prestonburg, West Liberty and Jackson (under construction). The Harlan school's extension is at Barbourville.



WELDING is taught at both Mayo (above), and Northern schools. Oxhitol and electric welding are taught at two of the area schools, and those courses vary in office practice (left) at Northern Kentucky to basic typing, shorthand and other secretarial skills. All three State schools give instruction in office practice.

THESE STUDENTS at Mayo are learning the printing trade. Mayo was the State's first vocational training school, opened in 1926 to serve the people of Eastern Kentucky. Kentucky Press Association sponsors class.

CARPENTRY students in their shop at West Kentucky State, as at other vocational schools, also gain practical experience from repairs and other work on the school's buildings and equipment. West Kentucky also has a masonry class.

RADIO, TELEVISION and electronics are taught at all three State schools. This student is at Mayo. Vocational school students learn not only the manual skills of a trade but also the underlying principles of why a job is done a certain way.

AUTO MECHANICS, shown at West Kentucky State, is taught at most of the state's vocational schools, but apprentice plumbing (right) is taught only at Northern Kentucky.

We hear lots of talk about "change" during the month of January.

Just as sleepy-eyed dad must get used to the new arrival, so must we all remember that it's now 1962 and get out of the habit of writing 1961 on letters and checks.

Most of us made some kind of a resolution for the New Year. Personally, we hope that something can be done to change the buying habits of the local citizens who have not come to realize that their money goes further—and does more for the community—when they buy from local stores.

We think it makes sense to deal with folks who may have need of some product or service which we customers may provide.

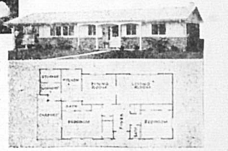
Mr. and Mrs. Dick Reddick of Lexington say:

"So pleased.... we'd never have any other kind."



The 1350 square feet of living area in the Reddick's home was heated during the 1960-1961 heating season for only $218.

"There's nothing so fine in a home as flameless electric heat," says Mrs. Reddick. "There's a thermostat in every room so you control the heat as easily as you control the lights. Your home is virtually free of dust, dirt and noise, and the cost is so completely reasonable for all the extra advantages electric heating gives you. We are so pleased with electric heat that we'd never have any other kind."

Month after month throughout Kentucky scores of families are turning to flameless electric heat in new and remodeled homes. Electric heat costs less to install, less to maintain. It may cost a little more to use, but it's worth a lot more in comfort, convenience and safety. Building? Modernizing? Investigate electric heat. KU heating specialists will help you plan, and estimate annual heating costs before you decide.
