Right Out of the Blue.

Three of those very colored boys from Christmas (which is a whole month ago today) saw a suspicious character on the kitchen floor. There, right in the kitchen in broad daylight, was a five economy-size wasp! Up n at 'em, he was preparing for a bath-off but did not get the chance to announce the destination. In less than ten minutes, while I was still a nervous wreck, the biggest mosquito I ever saw zoomed by at the rate of 99 m.p.h. which came very near costing the prize of a new pair of "specks." I presume they were in cahoots. Next came entrance to the house via my fresh cedar and mistletoe decorations. God, em bobs!

Please Pass the Peanuts.

A friend of mine living about a mile from town was telling me about the large number of birds that began coming to her home for something to eat during the below-zero weather. Besides the usual sparrows and starlings there are several redbirds and numerous other varieties. Also a crippled jaybird and a squirrell have learned about the free lunch and now come for a handout. Rations disappeared as if by magic . . .

One day the hungry throng flitted and fussed around after every crumb and grain of cracked corn was gone and the man of the house had started to town. Shortly he returned well pa "loaded." (Do not let that word throw you! Sure the price of cigarettes was clean out of his pocket, so he settled for the old-fashioned peanuts he saw nearby. Do not confuse the item with salted peanuts, mind you. for Toothy prefers to do his own shelling. Each day he is rewarded with a handful of peanuts, leaving the crumbs and shells for the resourceful pigeon and others of his adopted family. Toothy leaves only a crumb of his precious diet. Sorry, he refuses his own allowance. When he has had enough, he carries the remainder, one by one, to a safe hiding place known only to himself "just in case" of another food shortage.

Seeing and hearing the young boy singer, a talent contestant at Paul Dunbar High School in Lexington, brought to mind a talent contest I attended at Paris High School in the early 1920's. Mrs. Jake Kinney, 74, one thought which is good memories of the Hollywood night time and anywhere. The Real Meaning of Prayer.

Recently, while reading the Upper Room, I found the follow- ing thought which is good pre- cious and others of his adopted family. Toothy leaves only a crumb of his precious diet. Sorry, he refuses his own allow-
