Hawaiian Dip is tasty, calorie-conscious party fare. Here's the recipe from USDA. Cut a fresh pineapple in half crosswise; remove the pulp carefully and cut into bitesize chunks. Add a little sugar and let marinate an hour in the refrigerator. Pour the juice into a cup of cottage cheese, along with sour cream. Add honey and a little lemon juice if you like. Serve the cheese with pineapple shell "bowl" surrounded by pieces of pineapple and whole strawberries. Offer wooden picks for easy dunking.

Sonic boom, boom, boom

Local farmers and city folks alike have been feeling the effects of the sonic boom, as aircraft have been flying at supersonic speeds overhead. Livestock and poultry have also been startled.

The following statements are from "The Sonic Boom", a publication prepared by the Directorate of Information, Headquarters, Strategic Air Command, U.S. Air Force, Offutt Air Force Base, Nebraska:

To many people, startled by its abrupt sound, the sonic boom seems a noisy and unnecessary nuisance.

Unlike most nuisances, however, the sonic boom is unavoidable, and because of the world situation, it is a sound that we cannot live without. It is a sound that will be heard more and more often as this country progresses farther into the age of supersonic flight.

At this time, only military aircraft are capable of creating a sonic boom, but in the future, it is likely that civilian airliners and transports also will travel supersonically on their longer flights.

Despite some thoughts to the contrary, sonic booms are not caused by "aerial hot-rodders" at play, but by mature, dedicated air crews seriously studying their wartime jobs. The better these men are prepared to do their jobs in time of war, the stronger is this nation's deterrent force—the force that prevents any other country from attacking the United States.

The sonic boom first came to the Strategic Air Command with assignment of B-58 Aircraft, the free world's only bomber able to fly at speeds greater than the speed of sound. Tactical Air Command and Air Defense Command, along with certain Navy units, earlier had fighter aircraft capable of breaking the sound barrier. Today sonic booms are created by aircraft of all these organizations.

In time of war SAC crews will count on the tremendous speed of the B-58 Hustler" to dash to an enemy target and return, keeping to a minimum the time the plane would be exposed to enemy defense.

A sonic boom is caused by shock waves which build up around an aircraft flying at supersonic speeds—normally about 62 miles per hour at sea level. The waves from cone, extending back from the nose of the plane (much like the waves created by a boat speeding over water. The shock waves travel to the ground at the speed of sound and follow the path of the aircraft. The sound waves become audible when they slap against the surface of the earth, just as water whipping against the shore can be heard. This same kind of pressure wave is created by a common thunderclap.

In level flight at supersonic speeds a B-58 actually drags the edge of the shock waves it produces along the ground over its entire flight path. Under certain atmospheric conditions, the waves may reach the ground several miles on either side of the path of the aircraft. At other times, the boom may not be heard at all, as atmospheric conditions may dissipate the
