THE ROLE OF LAND-GRANT COLLEGE OR UNIVERSITIES IN OUR STATE DURING THE PAST CENTURY

By Mrs. Harold McClelland
 Just a hundred years ago the opportunity for higher education was for the "blue blood" and the wealthy. Higher education was the domain of the classical and continental type. This meant only the students for the learned professions at their disposal.

The new needed education meant that the industrial class, the included nearly every one who wanted a training. The new field for the development of the state was to be found in the land-grant colleges. The first was the University of Kentucky at Lexington and Kentucky State College at Frankfort. The latter was the first to be established in 1862. The first was the University of Kentucky at Lexington and Kentucky State College at Frankfort. The latter was the first to be established in 1862.

Our great industrial revolution was in progress forth the educational revolution was in progress on its heels. The July 2, 1862 President Abraham Lincoln issued the act that the Morrill bill had passed. The Morrill bill had passed the House of Representatives. "You'll say unto this, Today shall be with me as yesterday."
 St. Luke 21:45

Looking into the future, present eyes of one of the three being crucified with Him, Jesus said these words. There is a promise in these words for our modern world and each individual, the same promise that has existed since Jesus spoke them. "Today shall be with me as yesterday." This is a great promise, a promise that we can all claim as our own.
