FARM & HOME

168-day feeding period. Each steer had eaten 47 bushels of corn—12 bushels more per steer—and averaged 1,067 pounds weight. These steers returned $53.43 in head to labor, management and investment at a head to averaged choice grade beef.

Bradley said the test showed that the extra corn—i.e., the first two months when pasturage is good—is not really necessary. The steers could have been started and kept on grass two months, and the cost saved for the extra 12 bushels they ate in that period.

Worked out in U. of K. Test
Steers can be fattened on grass and then finished on a combination of grass and corn to a "most acceptable" market point.

That was the report this week of Neil Bradley, U. K. Ag Experiment Station beef research. Bradley ran tests three years to check the system.

He said steers so handled—grass the first two months, when pastures are good, then corn with grass—did extremely well in his tests. The test steers got grass 56 days from May 1, then corn for an additional 112 days with the pasture. They averaged 2.22 pounds daily gain on the grass alone, and 2.0 pounds a day on a grain-and-pasture ration. The lot weighed 1,036 pounds average at the end of the test and graded average choice on foot at sale time.

Bradley said the steers returned $57.73 to labor management and investment costs. The other set of steers was given corn from the start; that is not confined to grass alone the first two months. At the end of the

Ky. Guardsmen Are Praised

Frankfort, July 29—The men have done an outstanding job and we are proud of them." That's the way Brigadier General William H. Buster described the 2,250 Kentucky National Guardsmen which maneuvered long military convoys to Fort Bragg, N. C. last weekend. It was the start of their annual summer field training.

"We moved 528 military vehicles pulling 129 trailers, artillery weapons, or radar units, an average of 500 miles without an accident or incident," General Buster reported.

The deputy inspector general for an airborne corps, Lt. Colonel Robert G. Lovell, said the safe convoy movement "a remarkable feat." Lovell will direct the team which will evaluate training and operations performed by Kentucky Guard units at Fort Bragg.

Bivouac On The Way

The trip was the longest ever attempted by a major part of the Kentucky Army National Guard. It was necessary to find adequate artillery ranges for use by the many state artillery units. In the previous eight years, the artillery units have conducted their annual training at Camp Breckinridge (Ky.), however that post was declared surplus by the Department of Defense last fall and has been closed.

Upon arrival at Fort Bragg, all units moved directly into bivouac areas in the field where they will remain during the entire training period.

Selective Service

Question: I am classified 1-D under 26 years of age and have no dependents. Can I volunteer for induction through my local board?

Answer: You may volunteer through your own local board. After you have been found acceptable by the Armed Forces Examination Station you will be processed for induction. Since you are now a member of the Armed Forces you may apply for active duty after attaining the age of 26.

Question: I am a registrant who has been examined and found fully qualified for military service. I am nearing my 26th birthday. Can I be inducted after reaching age 26?

Answer: You may be inducted into service after attaining the age of 26 provided your liability has been extended and your order to report for induction was issued before you reached age 26.

"Fleming-Mason Co-op makes me a better farmer...

by supplying low-cost electric power...by showing me how to use it better," says George R. Harmon, Rt. 3 Maysville, Kentucky

"Fleming-Mason RECC provides me power for my call growing business and general farm operation. It heats and pumps the water, automatically controls the mix and temperature of my dairy call feeding equipment. Their cheap electricity and helpfulness make me a better farmer."

YOUR Fleming-Mason Rural Electric Co-op

Supplying low-cost, abundant power and improving electric service to farmers are—and always will be—the main purposes of Kentucky's Rural Electric Co-ops. But the "power" of RECC electricity is far-reaching. Because it makes the farmer more efficient and more prosperous it gives him more money to spend—for necessities and luxuries. And this money is spent in the shops and stores, in the towns and cities of Kentucky. When Kentucky's farmers are prosperous... all Kentucky benefits.
