

From the Diary of a Country Editor by Warren R. Fisher Sr.

green lettuce, vines of lucerne and red tomatoes. He may see his suburban tenths hung with fat pods, may dream a regiment of green stalks, bearing their own green knapsacks of ivory or golden ears. And the flowers? There are lady hollyhocks by the garden wall, the lilac bush in the corner, the spraying gold of the freynilla and the cascading foam of the bridal-creeper. Later will come rose-romantic roses, or so they will be always to me, mingled in memory with the vision of a blue-eyed witch—a queen sleeping upon a bed of roses. The bed was only a couch; the stage of the present, but the rest of a village school and I was not Prince Charming, sleekly but only a lad who loved the curtain. (Of which happening I have told my wife, and this was long ago, she also would rate me soundly no doubt, for remanaging this in print.)

Summer was in my freizee and ear and nostrils, but what deck my gardens. The moon flowers twist their fat vines up trellises and the blue and purple and white a fragrance that is to me a freedom of the Orient; stinnas and dallas unfold their perfect leaves and at the end, the fresh, frosty fragrance of the carnyanthum, and so far, well to summer of these colorful buds, productive, pastime is freizee gardening, as a sheet of snow emerges with uncaloused hands.

It was a very cold morning, if you remember, and the breeze blocked the doorway. The frightened mother and the children out and there was no one in the house. The other had gone to his work.

When you do to do by the fire and from my chair I may see my super mania, which I permitted a journeyman trimmer to trim last week, after making sure that he had heard and appreciated Jesse Kilmer's "Trees." A very expert he proved to be, thinning out the limbs, close to the trunk with a saw and not chopping out the tops with a dull hatchet, a form of hachery that prevails in this town and irks the soul of one who loves a tree. So it may be that I will get my lawn grassed this summer, which is a compromise of sorts to me for putting saw to a tree.

Now, thinking of the great old beauties of my sugar maple in a hobby, when they are honeycombed covets for shy, slim catkins, I am conscious of a hunger for the spring, a hunger, this day of sparkling winter sunshine, bearing the gifts of frosty beauties to eye and ear and nostrils, but what deck my gardens. The moon flowers twist their fat vines up trellises and the blue and purple and white a fragrance that is to me a freedom of the Orient; stinnas and dallas unfold their perfect leaves and at the end, the fresh, frosty fragrance of the carnyanthum, and so far, well to summer of these colorful buds, productive, pastime is freizee gardening, as a sheet of snow emerges with uncaloused hands.
