LET'S LOOK IT OVER
BY Edward T. Breathitt

Frankfort — Autumn brings many things to my mind, but perhaps the most persistent is the beauty of Kentucky in this season. I've been in nearly every section recently, and all across the state it's the same. Here and there the leaves are gradually turning from green to brilliant crimson and gold, and soon the entire woodlands will be ablaze with color.

Here in Frankfort, the Capitol grounds are still blooming with bright chrysanthemums and the Floral Clock is continually attracting visitors with its bright plantings. After the first frosts, the clock will be replanted with a new face for the season ahead. Any time you are in Frankfort, I hope you will visit the Capitol and tour the grounds. I think they are the loveliest of any I have seen.

The beauty that fall brings to Kentucky shouldn't be taken too lightly, however. While our forests are at their finest now, they are also in more danger from destructive, ravaging fires.

Indications have already shown that this could be one of our worst fire seasons. The dry weather has left our woodlands ripe for a careless match or neglected camp fire. The Forestry division, in the Department of Natural Resources, has already sent their men up to the observation towers to keep watch—more than a month ahead of the normal schedule because of the dangerous conditions left by the summer's drought.

We can't be too careful with our woodlands. Forests are one of Kentucky's most important resources. They cover 45 per cent, or more than 11½ million acres of the Commonwealth's total land acreage. The present uncut value alone is estimated at about $9.5 million annually. And fires are the most destructive single force to our trees.

Last spring, 1,308 fires blazed over 26,568 acres of our woodlands—and that was a "light" season. Now, when conditions are more dangerous, it is up to all of us to be as careful as possible to prevent a worse loss during this season.

So whether you're out hunting or camping, or just taking a drive to enjoy our autumn scenery or burning brush on your property—please obey all the rules of safety.

Speaking of hunters, this autumn in Kentucky also brings an opportunity to try something a little different—but only if you're the pioneer type. Kentucky's Primitive Weapons Hunting Area—the only one of its kind in the nation—is open this year for the first time to hunt all species of game in season.

Hunting in this 8,000-acre setting, located in the Cumberland National Forest in Bath and Menifee counties, is limited only to primitive weapons— longbows, crossbows and muzzle-loading rifles or shotguns. This is one of the few areas in the United States where crossbows are legal weapons for hunting. And, it is the only place in the country set aside for primitive weapons only, thus eliminating the competition from conventional firearms hunters.

The Primitive Weapons Area could easily turn into a major tourist attraction for that section of Kentucky, with its easy accessibility from the metropolitan areas of Louisville, Cincinnati and Ashland. The area can be reached from U. S. 60, between Owingsville and Morehead.

Last January, at the first Governor's Conference on Forestry, Robert Collins, the U. S. Forest Service supervisor of the Cumberland Forest, estimated that for each deer killed by a bowhunter, a return of $5,280 in expenditures can be expected. How much of this amount is spent in the community close to the hunting area will depend, he said, on the attitude of the community and its business establishments. This kind of potential is well-worth working for.

Just one more word for hunters: Please be careful, not only with your fires and matches, but also with your weapons. Safe and sane handling of guns and bows is called for at all times. And best of luck.
