Sediment Damage Public Concern

Sediment damage to streams, lakes, water supply reservoirs, road culverts, and other community facilities throughout Kentucky is a growing public concern, according to information released by Homer A. Taff, head of the USDA Soil Conservation Service State Office at Lexington, Ky.

"Outmoded farming methods that allow soil to wash off of the landscape create part of the problem. The trouble becomes acute where builders and developers expose large areas of raw earth without providing adequate safeguards."

Investigations show that soil allowed to wash or blow away can cost the taxpayer as much as $1 a cubic yard in sediment removal operations. The same cubic yard can be held in place harmlessly for as little as three or four cents, according to conservationists.

Taff said that SCS has set up technical means of aiding developers seeking to control sediment. Assistance is available through offices of Kentucky's 121 soil conservation districts. It includes help in planning protective vegetation, soils and topography examinations, special water ways and simple structures to prevent the mud and flooding often caused by construction.

Responding to public interest in the increasing rate of land and water damage, Taff announced that SCS has prepared a picture booklet, Entitled "Sediment Is Your Problem, the publication may be obtained at all district offices in Kentucky.
