Rainfall Helps Tobacco Crops

Tuesday's rains were worth untold dollars to Kentucky's tobacco crops, according to Ira E. Massie, University of Kentucky Tobacco Specialist.

The rains were general over Kentucky and Southern Indiana. The Kentucky Crop and Livestock Reporting Service said that before the rains many tobacco plants had begun to yellow and bloom too early, which would have meant a sharp loss in yeild.

Massie said many of those plants will green up and grow again if they can get sufficient moisture from now until cutting time.

Rainfall unofficially in the Nicholas County area was over two inches last week.

This year's tobacco crop, is the slowest growing since the 1961 crop, according to the service. The slowness is attributed to an unusually dry July.
