FARM & HOME

by large yellow blotches between the leaf vines, with narrow dark green areas alongside the midrib and veins. Reducing soil acidity is the best way to prevent or alleviate manganese toxicity. A finely ground limestone should be applied as soon as the tobacco is harvested, and disked in before the cover crop is seeded. A soil test is needed to determine the amount of lime needed. Applying the limestone in the fall gives the material a chance to dissolve in the soil over the winter.

Before harvest is a good time for growers to take a good look at their tobacco fields and make some decisions about next years crop. The crop may need to be moved to a new field due to disease, poor drainage, etc. Some of the fields have been in tobacco for several years, and the soil structure has broken down. A field that has been in sod for a few years would be a good one to move to. Soil samples should be taken in the fall. Decide on the variety you wish to grow next year. Select one that has disease resistance and has good weight and quality.

A few reminders of things you might do now. Prepare the barn for housing. Remove any machinery, hay, etc. Sweep the barn out if you are going to cure with heat. See that sticks are in good shape. Let the crop ripen before cutting, and sow a cover crop as soon as possible after harvest.
