Krislow Discusses Presidents Proposed Cabinet Merger

President Johnson's recent proposal to merge the Commerce and Labor Departments under one secretariat will not make much headway among either labor or business leaders, in the opinion of Dr. Joseph Krislow, University of Kentucky professor of economics.

"Until details and justification of the president's proposal are spelled out, we can only offer our opinion as to his objective," Dr. Krislow said. "There are many ideas to this proposed merger. We cannot make a fair judgment until he tells us his reasons."

The present dual-departmental operation has served for 33 years with apparent success, even though it began in 1903 (under President Theodore Roosevelt) as a single department and served as such for ten years before being divided.

Dr. Krislow said that so far neither labor nor business leaders appear to be in favor of the president's proposal, although some have been notably non-committal to date.

"It is not yet clear if this merger would mean any great economy in governmental budget," Dr. Krislow added, "since neither department spends comparatively large amounts."

He said that it does pose some interesting questions concerning the possible background from which the new secretariat might be chosen, as well as under-secretaries and assistants to the secretary.

"We cannot help but think that a real trial secretariat might be drawn from the ranks of university technicians having skill and knowledge in both areas," Dr. Krislow continued. "It is personally thought that best results would be obtained from the either field of labor or business."

This also poses the question, he added, of how long an "oriented" secretariat from either group could serve before becoming persons non grato to the other side.

"This could lead to a regular rotation in office," he said.

One possible consequence of reducing the role of spokesman-or news source-is a single secretariat might be the lessening of public information activities, or even possible "silencing" of public pronouncements because of the secretary's background.

"Some of these questions President Johnson makes known in his full reasoning and objectives, he said. The public then will be in a position to weigh the pros and cons -- whether this is "change" or a strategy for a strategic step toward better-over-all conditions.

Dr. Krislow believes the merger proposal might stem from President Johnson's penchant for establishing a "constancy" before he acts, in order to expedite the action he seeks. "The appointment of a single head for both departments might draw together business and labor interests to facilitate useful action," he said.

"On the whole," Dr. Krislow added, "this could well be a strongly useful recommendation, based on sound 'looking-ahead' thinking, with the desirable goal of bringing labor and business forces into a closer, more productive mutual understanding."
