Thistle Control Needed

Many farmers are interested in controlling the nodding thistle. This thistle is one of the more obnoxius weeds to develop throughout the area in recent years.

Nodding thistle is a biennial plant that usually takes two seasons to complete its life cycle. The first year a rosetta, or small leafy plant, develops and grows close to the soil surface. The second year a seed stalk develops and the plant may grow to six or eight feet in height. Mature seeds develop in the heads the second year, then the plant dies. A single plant may produce several thousand seeds that are carried by wind, water, animals and farm machinery.

Nodding thistle can be controlled with 2, 4-D. Use ester or amine salt of 2, 4-D at the rate of one to two pounds per acre. The lower rate is successful when the temperature is above 60 defrees F. or after the plant develops flower stalks. Twenty gallons or more of spray is needed per acre. The above mentioned quantity of 2, 4-D concentrate should be used with 20 gallons of water and spray equipment calibrated to deliver about this amount of spray per acre.

Spraying should be done during late March or April, and treatment repeated next year. Spray during mild, clear weather where there is little wind.

A spray application in the fall will also kill many of the rosettes of first year plants.

2,4-D sprays can be used in grass pastures and in uncropped waste areas. Such sprays should not be used in alfalfa, clover, or areas near tobacco beds, tobacco fields, vegetable crops and ornamental crops.

Scattered thistle plants may be treated with a hand sprayer by using 2,4-D concentrate (4 pound active per gallon) at rate of two or three tablespoons per gallon of water. Apply enough to moisten the thistle leaves without run-off.

The thistle population has already increased in some areas to the point that neighborhood action will be necessary to eradicate it.

THE FAMILY LAWYER

"Coke" OR "coke"?

You wouldn't think more spelling was that important. Yet, American business firms are spending millions of dollars every year, just to remind the public to start certain words with a capital letter.

Reason: a hard-headed respect for the law of trademarks. According to this law, a valuable brand name may be lost by becoming a part of the language—just another word that anyone may use.

That is what happened to such once-famous trademarks as Aspirin, Mimeograph, Linoleum, Dry Ice, Escalator, and Kerosene. In each case, what began as a capital-letter private name ended as a small-letter public word. English was the richer, but the manufacturers were much the poorer—penalized, oddly enough, because its product had become too popular.

How does the law decide when a trademark slips into the public domain?

Basically a question of fact —whether the public has, in fact, come to think of the name as a description of the product itself, rather than as an indication of who makes it.

For example: a court held that "Cellophane" was no longer a trademark, largely because so many consumers simply knew no other way to describe that kind of product.

It is to fend off this fate that companies carry on their educational campaigns. An editorialist, or cartoonist, or author who spells "Coke" with a small c is likely to receive a polite reminder from the Coca Cola people that this spelling is wrong.

Just a company may lose trademark rights in a name that "goes public," so it ordinarily cannot gain trademark rights in a word that was part of the language to begin with. Unless such a word acquires an extra, secondary meaning, it will usually continue to be "free for all."

Thus: a manufacturer of aluminum-covered washboards was denied trademark rights in the word "aluminum." And the owner of a market was denied trademark rights in the phrase "food center."

In both cases, courts found the expressions merely descriptive, without any secondary meaning to be protected.

As one judge pointed out, if companies could freely carve out exclusive rights in common words and phrases, there would be a danger of "depleting the general vocabulary available for description of articles of commerce."
