

Selective Service System Recruits Rejectees Too

The Kentucky Selective Service is adding a new dimension to its relationship with human resources.

By recruiting rejectees who are not eligible for military duty, the Selective Service is acting as a recruiter of rejected registrants who are not eligible for military duty.

However, as Stephenson points out, the Selective Service System cannot require an individual to participate in any of the programs designed to improve his standard of living.

For many years, the director noted, the SS had advanced a policy of "examine the whole man" as a means of retaining those units for military service and helping them along the way to a better living.

The first step in this direction, he said, was the re-classification of registrants to Class I-Y.

Stephenson noted that the Kentucky Selective Service has been a program of pre-registration counseling director.

ward young men nearing the draft age and to help local board personnel explain to high school students their obligations under the law and, at the same time, encourage them to remain in school.

Expanding on this program, the SS local boards now cooperate with the State Departments of Economic Security, Education and Health in assisting registrants not acceptable for military service under current standards.

The 1-A and 4-F registrants are a major source for potential recruits in the local board program. In several instances, Stephenson said, SS registrants have organized meetings with local board members and other interested persons.

Students participating in the Youth Corps have been sent to SS local boards at clerk-training. This provides them with experience in office management.

Men with registrants who are considered for military service, Stephenson said, "Our local boards give vocational consideration to granting occupational training to those rejected as registrants under the Manpower Development and Training Program, which would also qualify for deferment when they are called for military service."

Stephenson noted that the Kentucky Selective Service has been a program of pre-registration counseling director.
