Obviously, so important a job is never done

THE many people who live in remote areas, the convenience of electric power is an exciting new experience brought to them by a rural electric cooperative.

Last year alone more than 150,000 new consumers were served by rural electric power lines. Many of them were getting electric power for the first time.

In addition to serving many new consumers such year, rural electrics must keep pace with the growing demand by existing consumers. In the past ten years the average monthly load on rural electric lines has nearly doubled—from 263 kilowatt hours in 1956 to 507 kilowatt hours last year.

If rural America is to continue to grow and prosper, the increased power needs must be met now and in the future.

Yes, the convenience that comes with the flip of an electric switch is commonplace to so many of us. But until all of us—rural and urban dwellers alike—enjoy that same convenience, there is an important job still to be done.
