by the widders of nature. He sees many breathtaking sunsets and sunrises. The moon and the stars and threatening storms add to the joy of the chase. Moose he knows it is all in the Great Park, and all will be well. Men from every walk of life partake of this great sport. All of them appreciate the presence of the Ishabandina of the woods and fields. Men who possess the means which permit them to hunt in great style and men who have been forced to do hard toil and have become lost with years have been known to have their heads, stretch to reach the heights and see a one in particular. "Thank God for so great a world of beauty and splendor."
