The exhibitor and the fisherman spend countless hours poring over the advertising in specialized publications. The potential market for goods serving recreation needs is open to every type of retailer. Drug, grocery, hardware, clothing, and variety stores, or, should handle items needed in sports activities.

The exigence of a market is not enough to build trade for a particular retailer. In sporting goods, as in any rapidly changing market, business goes to the retailer who anticipates demand and guides consumer through consistent advertising.

The retailer who is not getting his share of the new recreational trade probably has neglected to expand his advertising to keep pace with new consumer health and recreation more satisfying leisure time activities.

On this Holy Day . . . we pray that you will be blessed with health and happiness and the spirit of Christmas guide your future.

Cancer and Heredity
What causes cancer? This question represents one of the most important in medicine today. Many studies of heredity have been made. It has been shown that certain chemical and radiation causes in laboratory animals and, therefore, sometimes in man. Exposure to certain chemicals and radiation (such as too much sunlight) can result in various forms of cancer. In addition to these and other environmental agents, scientists are studying the role of heredity in cancer.

Specialty breed laboratory mice have been used for many years to investigate whether a tendency to get cancer can be passed on from parent to offspring. These studies show that not only that many genetic factors are responsible for the heredity of the animals to develop specific types of cancer. For example, several different strains of mice that seldom develop breast cancer were exposed to a virus known to cause breast cancer in mice. The descendants of some of the strains developed breast cancer much more frequently than the original animals. Subsequent generations of these mice, however, developed breast cancer with the same frequency as the virus disappeared from their blood. This shows that heredity factors may influence how the virus will affect a cancer-producing chemical or virus and how the cancer will progress in the body.

When human populations were studied, most of the common forms of cancer did not seem to be passed on within families. Yet, some special studies do show that, to a very small extent, cancer of the breast, rectum, and lung strike in certain families more than others. However, since families share the same environment, that a hereditary factor is actually involved in the excessive incidence of cancer. Some other forms of cancer and precancerous conditions in man are definitely influenced by heredity. For example, retinoblastoma, which causes blindness and death in children, can be inherited. Fair skin, abnormally sensitive to ultraviolet radiation, and multiple polyps of the colon-rectum are inherited characteristics that predispose to the development of cancer.

On the basis of current evidence, it cannot be said that
