KINDERGARTER KÄPPERS

our big Santa Claus bead made from coat hangers and with a white cotton beard. We used them to decorate our kindergarten room and later took them home to hang in our windows and on our doors.

Finally the big day came when we had our Christmas play and party. Many of our friends, mother and daddys came to our play. They seemed to think we did real well in our first public performance, but the best part of all came when we heard the jingle bells and saw Santa Claus coming through the door. We were so tickled to see him and get to talk to him.

We have had such fun learning to work and play together.

THE FAMILY LAWYER

Mental Anguish

With blunt and angry language, Millie's boss told her she was fired. Understandably upset, Millie filed suit for the "mental anguish" she had suffered.

But she could point to no personal violence, no slanderous words. The court concluded that her complaint was not tangible enough to support a claim for damages.

That has long been a basic rule of law. You may collect damages for mental anguish only if it is the result of some other wrongful act, such as assault or battery or false imprisonment. But not for mental anguish alone.

Why hasn't the law given compensation for mental anguish just as freely as for physical anguish? Mainly because of the danger of opening a Pandora's box of fake claims. How could a court tell if the complaint of mental anguish, uncorroborated by any other specific offense, was really true?

Nevertheless, with the advance of science, we have learned a great deal more about our mental processes, including the causes and effects of mental anguish.

As a result, the law has grown steadily more tolerant of such claims, at least where the evidence of harm is reasonably clear and the conduct complained of is particularly outrageous.

Thus, a woman won damages for mental anguish from a troublemaker who spread a false rumor that her son, away at college, had hanged himself.

And a young girl won damages for mental anguish from a furniture repossessor who, knowing that she was home alone, used terrifying threats to make her open the door.

However, the law does not and cannot promise total tranquility to mankind. As a leading authority put it:

"Against a large part of the irritations of community life, a certain toughening of the mental hide is a better protection than the law could ever be."

In one case, a customer in a bar took offense at a waiter's derisive comments. But when the customer demanded damages for his mental anguish, a court turned him down.

"Plaintiff's charge amounts to nothing more than that his feelings were hurt," said the judge. "This does not state a cause of action."
