West Kentucky Growers Concentrate On Tomatoes

One fact underlies a successful business.

If the public wants the product, produce it.

Western Kentucky, and generally the Purchase Area, found years ago that the Chicago fresh produce market liked west Kentucky tomatoes.

"They have a distinctive flavor," one broker keeps telling a group of McCracken, Ballard, and Marshall county producers.

Result: Without fanfare, several West Kentucky producers grow field tomatoes by the thousands.

They encounter the usual problems of disease, insects, weather and somewhat changing market prices. Be careful management and efficient management, they battle through.

It isn't a new project. Some of the area's growers have been in the business 25 to 30 years. However, more are coming in as they see the financial benefits.

Dr. Richard Roberts, staff horticulturist at Lexington, says the crop is a "risk" type but that the growers are learning every day to lower it.

Emerson Jones of Paducah, normally a weed-control specialist, sees his people growing "more careful" every year in tomato work.

Both men say the income potential is high. "If you produce a quality crop, you most always can sell it. Kentucky tomatoes have the flavor the Chicago brokers like and say is not duplicated elsewhere. This works for us. We want to encourage more people to get in, but at the same time point out the risk. This game takes a smart, willing-to-work farmer who can take the gaff."

Most growers use plastic greenhouses to grow their plants. This in itself can be a headache, because of disease, but it can be a profitable business. Paul Russell of Balard county grows most of his plants for sale to other growers, though he will put out field plots some years. He started from a small "hobby" greenhouse some years ago.

The area contrasts on the "early" market. Planters hope to set out field plants by early or mid-April, depending on weather. They usually harvest in June. This year in the area, perhaps a million plants were set out.

"Last year, some of the growers got $8 for a 20-pound lug, a cardboard box," Dr. Roberts said. "We consider this an excellent price, because the crop is a high-labor and high-investment one. You can have $1,000 an acre tied up in the plants at picking time. But when you realize that a grower can gross from 50 cents to $1 a plant, you see the potential. When there are 5,000 to 10,000 plants an acre, you get an idea of what a careful grower can do. Actually we figure a good grower may GROSS $4,000 an acre."

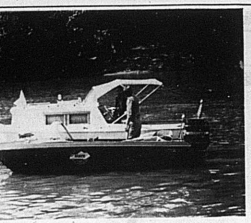
Jones points out that though there is a high gross, there also is a high-cost factor. Picking is expensive, land costs usually high, and weather variable that can cut you down to size in a night.

But the area produces from 30 to 60 percent No. 1 tomatoes off its acreage. Marketing is relatively easy. Brokers maintain pick-up stations in two counties, and growers are paid what the tomatoes bring on the Chicago market.

Most growers use hybrids because of higher production per plant, sturdiness, vigor and good fruit characteristics. The usual diseases are encountered--damping off in the plastic greenhouses, anthracnose, the fusarium wilts and early blight. Insects such as hornworms and aphids are problems, and occasionally the tomato fruit worm and fleabeetles.

About 150 growers are actively engaged in the project now. Some branch into fields lettuce production, or egg plant, turnips, squash, peppers or cabbage.

Whatever the product, Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati seem glad to get them.



PATROLLING FOR BOATERS' SAFETY—Kentucky State Police troopers are patrolling the state in motorboats as their law enforcement duties now include waterways. The troopers conduct safety inspections on boats and enforce navigation laws. Kentucky State Police were charged with water patrol when Public Safety Commissioner W. O. Newman recommended Gov. Louie B. Nunn abolish the Department's Boating Division.

Olive Hill Clays Produce New Insulating Material

Clays found in the Olive Hill, Kentucky, area can be used to manufacture insulating material that could mean creating about 50 new jobs and tapping a multi-million dollar market, according to a Federally financed study released today.

The new insulating material, called Eda, was developed by Spindletop Research, Lexington, under a technical assistance project of the Economic Development Administration, U.S. Department of Commerce.

The study was requested by the Olive Hill Development Company.

In its report, Spindletop said the Eda insulation should open up new markets because of high potential use temperatures, coupled with interception of radient energy at the higher temperatures.

The report recommended development of a pilot plant to assure smooth transition to commercial production and to produce material for market development.

It was estimated that full production of the new insulation could create about 25 manufacturing jobs, plus about 15 jobs for administrative and supervisory personel. An investment of about $215,000--excluding land and buildings--would be required, the study said.

The study estimated that the insulation could be sold in a market in which current sales range between $8.7 million and $23.7 million. Marketing could be handled by the manufacturer or a distributor.

Grass To Man Via The Cow

"Let them eat grass" said the old French aristocracy when told their people were starving. They did not realize just how apt their words could be until dairy products became the byword of the world.

The dairy cow is the best way to market grass, a crop for which Kentucky is famous. She is the most efficient converter of cellulose to human food that man knows. Furthermore, she doesn't limit her ability to grass alone.

As an example of the versatility of the dairy cow to produce human food, scientists at Penn State University fed cows newspapers and urea. The cows may have shaken their heads a bit at the silliness of man but they ate and went right on producing human food--milk.

For that matter, dairy scientists at the University of Kentucky fed some of their experimental animals corn cobs and urea. While their production records were not of the best under either of these experimental conditions, Maidens kept on producing milk.

Nor are these experiments as far out as they sound. For the future, ways must be found to feed animals food stuffs that will not compete with human demands for the same feeds. Humans cannot eat grass, newspapers or corn cobs. Cows can--and still produce a high quality human food. It will only be in this way that the human race will be able to enjoy a rich animal-food-product diet. The old cow has been the "foster mother to the human race" for many centuries and it looks like she will continue to do so despite the population explosion.

From Seed To Sod

"Normally, bluegrass grown from seed of Kentucky origin has proven consistently superior in performance to all named varieties produced in foreign countries and in the northwest, largely due to resistance to diseases and insects.

"Therefore, the production of Bluegrass is certainly one way for farmers to increase their incomes. I have 1,500 acres in Bluegrass seed. I call it Kentucky's only four-way crop. What other crop will give you 300 to 400 pounds of seed, one and a half tons of hay, 10 months of good grazing and improve the fertility of your land?" Walden said.

J. Robert Miller, the State's commissioner of agriculture, endorsed Walden's remarks, saying, "Gov. Nunn and his staff are very interested in helping the Bluegrass industry. Bluegrass has made a major contribution to the good image of Kentucky and we are proud the state bears its name. The adaptation of Bluegrass to Central Kentucky has caused the livestock farming to flourish. Worldwide attention has been directed to the quality horses and cattle produced in this section of the state.

"We want to encourage Kentucky's farmers to grow Bluegrass. It's a productive crop, and we believe Mr. Walden has proven it to you today," Miller concluded.

New Eye Test for Sun Sensitivity

It is now possible for those who sell sun glasses to measure accurately the degree to which an individual's eyes are sensitive to sunlight. The measuring is performed with a newly perfected device by Univis, Inc., Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

The instrument is in a box in which the viewer sees two small horizontal bands of light, with a band of black sandwiched between. His degree of sensitivity is measured by the point at which the black band becomes invisible, as the operator gradually increases the intensity of the light from the other two bands.

To a person whose eyes are extremely sensitive to bright sun, the black band vanishes within a few seconds after the test begins. Another person may watch for 15 or 20 seconds before he can no longer see it.

With the help of a coordinated chart, the fitter selects lenses for the buyer that are tinted to match the glare protection that his eyes require.

Properly fitted sun glasses, the company notes, are those which give individual maximum vision combined with adequate protection from glare.
