KATHERINE PEDEN talks with Albert Both and Charles Cox while in Carlisle, Tuesday in the interest of her campaign for Democratic Senator from Kentucky.

Miss Peden Critical of Opponent

Katherine Peden, democratic candidate for U. S. Senate spoke in Carlisle, Tuesday at the courthouse. She took part in her opponent for his lucky which would give the farmer running water for his home, the state program of these districts to give our rural citizens the convenience and fire protection of running water and to allow our rural areas to compete for the luring of new industry. She charged that "New York City, where he came from, may not need running water, but our rural citizens here in Kentucky do".

Miss Peden also attacked those who have long used the tobacco farmer as a "slugging boy" and pointed out that in the Senate she will always fully support the industry. She also criticized her opponent for his "anti" attitude throughout the campaign such as his opposition to Medicare which gives medical aid to our elderly; his opposition to free textbooks and bus transportation for Kentucky's schoolchildren; and his repeated refusal to discuss Kentucky issues.

She also repeated her strong stand for "law and order", calling for the full support of "free men who wear the badge". In so doing she cited the staggering increase in Jefferson County's crime rates, charging that opponent has done little to curb crime in the county in which he holds the Chief Executive Office for more than a decade since he took office. "Now," she continued, "this area ranks 15th from the top in the 143 metropolitan areas in this nation" and she expressed concern that this crime increase might spill over into the rest of the state.

She concluded her remarks by promising to be a hard-working 120-Country Senator to represent the interest of all Kentuckians during the next 6 years.
