In the past, the U.S. Post Office Department has been much like the weather. Everybody talks about it, but no one does anything to improve it. In June of 1968, the Director of the U.S. Post Office, James H. Bevel, announced the formation of a new organization, the National Post Office Improvement Commission (NPOIC). The NPOIC is a group of representatives from various industries and government agencies who will be responsible for the improvement of the postal service. The NPOIC's first task is to conduct a study of the postal service and to report its findings to the Post Office Department. The NPOIC is expected to report its findings to the Post Office Department by the end of the year.
