

OUTDOOR FOCUS

By Vance Wood

If you like to hunt, particularly big game, chances are you are one of the many Americans who will buy a new rifle this fall. Your reasons may be varied and numerous, but a firearm is a highly personal possession, a source of pride to the owner and it should be chosen carefully.

You plan to buy a new rifle, either you do not have one or you want a better one. Either way, there are many things to consider before making your final choice. Two major decisions you will have to make are (1) the type of action and (2) size or caliber. One can buy that does not necessarily determine the other.

Important factors affecting your final choice, then, are where you hunt, the type of hunting you do, the type of hunter you are, your considerations of limitations, if any, and your budget. A hunter who naturally prefers a semi-automatic firearm will probably never be completely happy with a bolt action rifle.

Let us consider first the type of action you may choose. The basic options of bolt action, pump, lever, semi-automatic, and gas-operated are those that will be available to you in the type of rifle you are looking for.

If you have a good rifle, it is likely you are a sportsman. You are likely to be a sportsman who is interested in more than just the rifle. You are likely to be a sportsman who is interested in more than just the rifle. You are likely to be a sportsman who is interested in more than just the rifle.

Thousands of these are now available in the market. They are available in a wide variety of calibers, from .22 to .30. They are available in a wide variety of calibers, from .22 to .30. They are available in a wide variety of calibers, from .22 to .30.

It is important to note that the type of action you choose will affect the way you hunt. A bolt action rifle is best for hunting in the woods. A pump action rifle is best for hunting in the open.

When you are buying a rifle, you should look for a rifle that is well made and that is easy to use. You should also look for a rifle that is well made and that is easy to use.

Food For Thought

Did you ever stop to think when you open a package of take out or a box of crackers? For example, the 25¢, 37¢, 24¢ and others. While the 25¢ and 30¢ are fine crackers, particularly in busy country, the high speeds attained by the velocity rollers make them work with a factor trajectory and more accuracy over long distances. Conversely, they will explode or shatter more easily in contact with woods, branches, etc. in the brush.

If you plan to use your rifle for dual purposes like varmint and deer hunting then an aluminum caliber such as .243 or .270 may be better. These are small enough for varmint, yet large enough for deer. They are not, however, recommended for deer, moose or bear.

If you prefer a larger caliber, with more muscle, then the .308 magnum, .375 or even a .44 magnum would be your best choice. With the larger bore, however, one who is not prepared to shoot much, recall which can be a major factor. Choosing the make of your new rifle is important, but secondary to other factors.

Even existence used in the making of the package come under scrutiny. Is the type of paper, kind of ink and adhesive used also considered carefully under external conditions of storage and use. Containers too, may not be the best. They should be approved by the U. S. Food and Drug Administration.

These are other considerations which you should take into account. They are not meant to be a list of things to be considered, but a list of things to be considered. They are not meant to be a list of things to be considered, but a list of things to be considered.

It is important to note that the type of action you choose will affect the way you hunt. A bolt action rifle is best for hunting in the woods. A pump action rifle is best for hunting in the open.

Actual designations contain a great many lines of planning and experience. Packaging engineers, chemists, and food manufacturers sometimes spend months producing the right package for a product.

For food being sold in a case of eye appeal, today's food packages perform many functions. They must protect the food from any heat or dirt. They also must protect the food from any heat or dirt.

We've Made It

It has been a long hard job getting ready but we finally made it. Drs. Fitzgerald and Sperry first received their Dental Office July 3, 1962 in the S.M.P. Hutchings' location. February, 1969, they purchased the property across from the Lyric Theatre and spent many hours thereafter on remodeling plus other services.
