THE FAMILY LAWYER

Enact the Ten Commandments?

Not long ago, a western lawmaker proposed the enactment of the Ten Commandments as part of the state's criminal code. The proposal did not pass. But it did put into sharp focus the relationship between moral law and criminal law.

There are striking differences between the two systems of law.

For one thing, moral law usually deals in generalities, criminal law in specifics. While the Sixth Commandment says generally that "Thou shalt not kill," the criminal law weighs the specific variations that may affect guilt in a particular case.

Thus, the criminal law recognizes that a person may indeed fulfill the necessary defense of himself or his family. This is not a violation of the Sixth Commandment. It is merely law on a different level.

Furthermore, moral law often sets standards that are hard to live by, as a practical matter, to be enforced by criminal penalties. Imagine, for instance, the difficulties of enforcing the Tenth Commandment—"Thou shalt not covet"—by fines or jail sentences.

Yet, in a deeper sense, criminal law must at least be in harmony with moral law if it is to be acceptable to the community. It is to the moral law that mankind looks for its directions and its aspirations.

And if moral law has the disadvantage of being general; it has the advantage of being enduring. Poet James Russell Lowell put it this way:

"In vain we call old notions fudge,
And bend our conscience to our dealing;
The Ten Commandments will not budge,
And stealing will continue stealing."

Also, because moral law speaks directly to the conscience, it may influence conduct in a way that no mere legislative enactment ever could.

In one case, a farmer posted a "NO TRESPASSING" sign in an effort to keep vandals from stealing his apple orchard. But apples continued to vanish. One day he changed the sign to read "THOU SHALT NOT STEAL." The thefts stopped at once.

Computer Talks Back via Phone

A low-cost, lightweight portable computer terminal that provides two-way communication with a "talking" computer through any standard telephone has been developed by Honeywell Inc.

The unit, called the COMPACT terminal, can be used by a businessman, salesman, or truck driver, to communicate via a telephone with a remotely located computer and receive a human-voice response within seconds, the firm's Electronic Data Processing Division said.

"This terminal extends the capabilities of the computer to many travelers who need immediate and direct access to information stored on computer files," said Eric N. Grubinger, group product manager of communications products. "It is a unit that can be used not only for data retrieval but also for data entry. It can be operated by almost anyone because it requires no knowledge of how a computer works."

The unit can be used for numerous functions by restaurants, department stores and banks to check a person's credit; by salesmen to check data on inventory or delivery status of goods; by policemen for information on a stolen or lost automobile; by executives for personnel or financial information, by purchasers to place orders from remote locations, he said.

"The moon will affect the tide—and the untied."

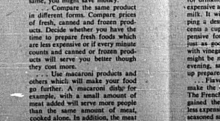
Happiness is the inviting aromas of your kitchen, the family eagerly asking "What's for dinner?" and finally, a good meal for all to enjoy.

The smart homemaker knows that what she buys can make her meals drab and delicious, tasty or tasteless and most important, within her budget or not.

Today, wise buying is becoming more and more important. But a better meal for less and you will be a better cook. Betty Brownell, home economist for the National Association of Food Chains, suggests 12 ways to save money and still eat a better meal before your family. Her dozen ideas save you time and money!

Get the shopping list habit. Keep paper and pencil handy in the kitchen and write things down as you run out of them. You might even save yourself an extra trip to the store.

Plan meals in advance. Use newspaper ads to give you ideas and tell you what's on sale or special this week. If ground beef is on the sale, you might decide to serve spaghetti one night and meat loaf a few nights later. The meat loaf could include leftover vegetables that shouldn't be wasted. Write down your menu plans but change if you find a better buy.

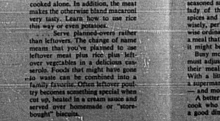


Be sure you've planned meals that are pretty as well as nutritious. Children, also, don't always have foods from the basic four groups every day. Meal food that group includes poultry and fish, Milk, Fruits and Vegetables and Breads and Cereals are the groups to remember. For eye-appeal, make your dinners colorful. A green vegetable does more for mashed potatoes and meat loaf than colorless assortment.

Compare brands of the same product. Take time to read the labels. The government requires that the weight and any added ingredients be listed clearly on the label. If you usually buy canned peas, compare prices of brands of the same weight. If the quality is the same, you might save money.

Compare the same product in different forms. Compare prices of fresh, canned and frozen products. Decide whether you have the time to prepare fresh foods which need added will serve more people than the same amount of meat, cost of each. In addition, the meat makes the otherwise bland macaroni and cheese taste better, so use rice this way or even potatoes.

Watch for specials on dinners rather than leftovers. The change of name means that you've planned a new leftover meal plus plus plus leftover version for a quality dinner treat. Foods that might have gone up in waste can be combined into a tasty favorite. Often leftover products become something special when cut up, heated in a cream sauce and served over homemade or "store-bought" biscuits.



Shop for meals planned around the main course. Meat is one of the biggest items in your food budget. If you've time to let a less tender cut of meat cook happily to perfection, you'll save money as these cuts are usually less expensive. Often, the time is not as long as you think. Shoulder steak can be simmer away in thirty minutes as you prepare the rest of your meal. Or, while the more expensive loin or rib chops save only 20 minutes and cost a great deal more money. Fish is often overlooked but is sometimes a good buy and a pleasant, nutritious change of pace.

Do-it-yourself foods save you money. A package of instant nonfat dry milk plus water gives you milk for drinking and cooking that's less expensive and as nutritious as whole milk. It will whip to a froth, topping a dessert treat for about two cents a cupful. Salad dressings, expensive for large families, can be just as good when made at home with vinegar and oil. Puddings, too, might be made at home during an evening, saving money by passing up prepared puddings.

Flavorings and seasonings can make the difference in your meal. The French, known for their sauces, spices and herbs, used sparingly but wisely, perk up a dish that's otherwise ordinary. Your family deserves a meal that's delicious—even though it might be low cost.

Busy mothers and working wives must adjust their time schedules to their meal planning and cooking. With a little practice, shopping in a supermarket can be an interesting — and money-saving — adventure.

A better shopper becomes a better cook who knows that happiness is a good dinner.
