Interobang

That peculiar looking punctuation mark at the end of our headline isn't a typo, and it isn't something we created for the occasion. It's called an interobang, and consists of a combination of an exclamation point and a question mark.

We became fascinated with this new development in punctuation—the first in hundreds of years, and checked with the local office of American Type Foundry Co., Inc. They told us it had been worked up in cooperation with the Society of Typographers. It seems a good conversation piece for our industry, and we thought you might be interested in hearing a bit about it.
