The pesticide problem in the recent past, considerable controversy was created by a book which cited the many dangers caused by the increasing use of poisonous pesticides. Recently, as much public reaction as the book created, at the time, a report by Dr. Callag revealed that the problem is of little concern to the average citizen. The poll was taken by calling for the National Wildlife Federation and its results were shocking. To say the least, to the nation's professional conservationists.

Only five per cent of the sampling indicated any concern over the country's wildlife resources. About two millions of people had been served the answers were in the former 151 Florida letters and 100,000 and 125 circulars of climate hunting.

Conservationists throughout the nation have been protesting the many ways that preservation of habitats for the survival of fish and game. Law enforcement is needed to protect the many areas in considered adequate while hunting is not permitted. This actually is necessary in many areas.

Failure of the responsible to even mention suitable habitat in the very increasing pollution problem. The N. W. F. taking its stand without a question, the greater danger to the many species of fresh water fish in the increasing use of pesticide. par-

The Federal Food and Drug Administration has set five parts per million of DDT as the maximum allowable in fish and commercially. Very low concentration caught in the Great Lakes have residues of the poison ranging up to 10 parts per million. Residues contamination has not proved to be a big problem yet in many areas, but concentration in sediments and DDT is still a threat throughout the country area. Residue a very eye on the whole problem.

"We began Monday," says one conservationist. "Why some companies keep making DDT when there are better and safer chemicals for insect control and when DDT has proved so harmful."

Some fish an DDT tolerance toward DDT, the scientist said, as do some insects. Caribbean, like minnow-like fish, had an immunity to the poisons. Insecticide in the pond water had one in a swimming deadly dose of poison to a larger fish. Likened to "swimming bombs" the little fish carry a whole life's worth of DDT until it kills a good sized fish.

Scientists have declared the use of DDT illegal in two states, Michigan and Indiana. Experiments have proved that the pesticide is a quality of beneficial use of antibiotics, fight cancer, and

Motorcycle Safety Law Is Held Invalid

A recently enacted state law requiring motorcycle riders to wear safety helmets and eye protective devices has been ruled unconstitutional by a Jefferson Circuit Court judge.

Judge Herman C. Zuerch ruled the law was class legislation and that it discriminated against a particular group, in the decision in which he held the law was invalid.

His ruling was given on the appeal of a Louisville man who had been charged with violating the helmet law and two other measures which were part of a motorcycle safety bill passed by the 1968 legislature.

Judge James B. Carr, assistant commonwealth attorney, said he felt sure Judge Zuerch's decision would be appealed. The ruling presumably could apply to more than 27,000 motorcycle riders in Kentucky.
