Old Furnace

heard of the real inventor, William C. Kelly?

Kentucky's iron production created during the middle 1800's. It was declining seriously by 1860, and only the advent of the Civil War gave it new life and prosperity for a few years. Many of the old furnaces died gone out of business by that time, anyway. One year from the beginning of the Civil War, however, there were still 17 furnaces operating in Kentucky and they were producing a total of around 42,500 tons of pig iron per year, worth in the neighborhood of $1-1/4 million.

The last gasp (or blast) of the Kentucky charcoal-iron smelting industry that I know of was when Center Furnace, now in the Land Between the Lakes area, closed down in 1912. It had been in operation intermittently for around 65 years.

Kentucky's iron smelting industry was foredoomed, really. The ores in various parts of the state are of inferior grade and insufficient quantity. Only in the northeastern corner of the state was the native ore competitive in quality with those of the great iron producing states. This is the Hanging Rock Iron Region. It includes Greenup, Boyd and Carter Counties in Kentucky and parts of Ohio.

Three steel plants now constitute the entire iron making industry in Kentucky, Ashland, Newport and Gwenabora.

Occasionally we come across an odd reminder of the old iron days. Here and there, for instance, you will find an old road made of the hard, glossy-looking slag that used to be disgorged by the old furnaces.

And many people in the rolling Bluegrass country derive daily benefit from a by-product of the old Bourbon Furnace. The smelter, of course, had attendant foundries and forges to shape the pig iron into tools, cannonballs, utensils, etc. And since there was no made road or waterway on which to transport these products, a new road was built. It began at the furnace on Slate Creek, went westward between Mount Sterling, Paris and Winchester, skirted Lexington, then headed through Scott County to Frankfort on the Kentucky River. This was the Iron Works Pike.
