ate a gap between the people and the Extension agents.
 County extension agents now will be assigned to each county and be responsible for assisting the people and developing educational programs within that county. These agents will be supported by area, multi-area, and state specialists when the local agent needs additional information or technical assistance, he explained.
 If a county has only one agent, he will develop programs in all four subject areas: agriculture, home economics, 4-H and development. Counties with two or more agents will have one assigned to agriculture and the other to either home economics, 4-H, or development. The agricultural agent and the other agent operate whatever their program area will be responsible for all the program areas.

 In counties where a county extension 4-H agent is not assigned, the other county extension agents will be expected to cooperate in working with the 4-H club members and volunteer leaders.

In the new system, the county extension agents will develop their programs and report directly to the appropriate assistant director for extension in the 14 counties. The 14 extension areas in the state will remain intact, and an area director will be responsible for administrative matters in the area.
 The Extension Service, founded about 1934, was created by an act of Congress to carry information and public service to rural families. It has been known to Kentuckyans by the work of the county agents and home demonstration agents. "It is this close contact with the people that we want to maintain," Barnhart stressed.

The Extension Service must understand now that we're working with such diverse groups as the people, rural families, small farmers, commercial producers and ag. business, he said.

"We believe that these changes will permit us to develop educational programs on the local level more effectively. The local agent, as a member of a community and with the help of local people, can determine how best to use the College of Agriculture, can assist the people, the dean added.

"If this system should develop demonstrably, we will further modify it to insure that the people of the Commonwealth have the best Extension Service in the nation," Barnhart concluded.
