Apply Lime In Fall For Best Results

Fall is the ideal time to apply ground limestone on acid soils. Equipment used in spreading limestone is heavy and the fall months give some period when the soil is firm enough to support the machinery's weight.

If the spreading of lime is delayed until spring it may be planting time before the soil is dry enough to support the heavy trucks. Heavy equipment moving over the field will compact the soil. Freezing and thawing during the winter months will reduce the damage from compacting.

The application of ground limestone is essential for high crop yields on much of the soil in Kentucky. However there are areas where limestone should not be applied since the soil is not acid. This may be due to past liming practices or parent materials from which the soil was derived. Test results of a representative soil sample should serve as a guide in determining the liming need.

Harold Miller, Extension Specialists in Soils at the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, recommends the early application of lime before winter weather hardens the ground.

Limestone reacts slowly in soil, and if applied in the fall it will have the advantage of correcting soil acidity through the winter months.

With heavier fertilization and higher crop yields soil acidity is becoming more of a problem in crop production.
