To Hunt The Hunter

Foxes are hunters, they make their living by hunting. This puts them in the professional class. Not many people hunt foxes professionally, even though some claim they do it only for money. So in reality most foxhunting is a case of the amateur, or at best semi-pro, trying to outwit the pro, the wily fox.

The deciding factor in most encounters between fox and the fox hunter is the degree of alertness each displays. If the professional fox is more alert than the amateur hunter the fox wins. And vice versa. Of course, the hunter has a few advantages over the fox. The hunter is bigger, usually more intelligent, and usually has a gun so the best the fox can hope for in such a case is to get home with a whole skin. As a rule the hunter escapes with his hide intact.

There are numerous types or kinds of fox hunting. Some are lowly and some are lofty. The loftiest form is traditionally English with horses and hounds, but the USA, including Kentucky, also has devotees of this method. Here, protocol is of the utmost importance and even the hounds are subject to rigorous rules. These dogs look alike and run in a pack. The clothing that the hunters wear is exacting and known as a habit. Certain individuals have special articles of clothing to distinguish them. There are the master-of-hounds, the whippers-in, and so forth.

But the most important part of this hunting is that no person ever kills the fox. Only the dogs are permitted to do this. The worst thing that one of these people can say about another is "He would shoot a fox."

Another kind of non-killing fox hunting could be called "hill topping." The foxes are neither shot nor otherwise killed in this kind of hunting. The hunting is done at night and the dogs and fox put on the show. The men sit around a fire and listen to the race. The distant voices of the hounds, the firelight, the excitement of the race, and the warmth of the companionship make the sport. To these men the fox is the second most noble creature that breathes air. The first the Beauregard

Bugle Boy Hound Dog. Many a tale is told of special foxes which ran for days and nights and of the noble hounds which sang on their trails. One of the classics of American literature, "The Voice of Bugle Ann," by MacKinlay Kantor, is based on the love of these men for their hounds and this sport.

But hunting to some people requires a gun or it isn't hunting. Foxhunting with guns, dogs, and people has many variations, all of which offer quantities of sport and each has different forms of excitement almost guaranteed to thrill you.

Fox hunting with guns and dogs brings the thrill of the chase, and excitement builds as the dogs approach, driving the fox before them. The long chase, which trawels over the hills and along the ridges and across the fields is more a part of the sport than the actual kill. The maneuvering for position, the attempts to anticipate the fox's route, and the sense of accomplishment at the end of the hunt are the rich rewards. There are men who would rather hunt for foxes in this manner than hunt in any other way.

When foxes became abundant in the Midwest, a type of hunting arose which involved a large number of persons working together. Here the dogs were forsaken. At first the objective was to kill and get rid of the blankety-blank foxes. But as people get involved in any kind of hunting, they frequently discover that they are actually having fun. This "gang hunting" of foxes is not exception. The principle is simple, but the accomplishment requires some leadership and coordination. A block of land is surrounded and the hunters move toward an established point or line. The foxes are thus driven out to the guns of the watchers. A great many man-hours of hunting are created and foxes are seen by many of the participants. Contrary to the original hopes of the hunters, foxes on the driven areas are not wiped out, though goodly numbers are frequently bagged.

Another form of fox hunting is by small groups of hunters without dogs. One or two hunters follow the tracts and keep the fox moving. The remainder take up stands where the fox will go past them. Very few people have noses good enough to follow a fox on bare ground so snow is necessary for this type of hunting.

A type of fox hunting which will really try your skill and ability, however, is to go out alone and tract the fox down all by yourself. You won't use up the supply of foxes very fast so don't worry about overshooting. This is the type of fox hunting that will probably teach you the most about foxes. It may teach you not to bother since there are only about one-thousand-and-one things that will keep you from getting the fox.

This sort of fox hunting, all by yourself, is called "Still Hunting." Most of the time you're moving, but you're "still hunting." To get the fox all you have to do is follow his trail until you come to him and then shoot him. This is very easy if you are more alert than the fox. Don't worry--very few foxes have sneaked up on hunters and shot them. If this happened once in awhile, hunters would probably be as alert as foxes. Under the present arrangement, hunters don't have the incentive for full-time alertness.

Since hunters are really quite easily outmaneuvered by foxes, some rather exasperating things can happen in still hunting. Just when you jump a fox, you'll be in a mentally relaxed state. This is when the fox shows himself. Of course, your gun will be wrapped around your neck and you won't be able to get your fingers out of your mitten to pull the trigger, or you'll be astride a fence, or looking the other way, or be hunched over behind a stump half asleep. The fox will look as big as a collie dog and as obvious as the sun in the sky. You'll wonder how such an animal can get out of sight so fast, and stay hidden so long.

But this is one kind of hunting in which skill is involved. The more of this hunting you do, the better at it you'll become. And when you get so you can sneak up on a fox and shoot him, the smartest buck deer in the world will be an easy mark.

back on the morning air and all cry for silence.

The trees seemingly tremble with joy as the hounds blend in their mixture of voices, all in tune and perfect harmony.

Standing in a trance, the hound men listen and perhaps draw a hand across their eyes. Music is being made for their benefit by that faithful pack of trusting hounds who look to them for protection, food and love.

These are some of the things that a foxhunter can never forget as he reflects and as each hunter calls his faithful friend to him at the end of the hunt, in his mind he might muse over these words:

I wonder if Christ had a black, white and tan,

I Can Dream

All sleek and sinewy like mine,
With two silky ears and a nose round and wet,
And two eyes so soulful that shine.

I am sure if he had, that that black, white and tan,
Knew right from the first he was God,
That he needed no proof, that Christ was divine,
But worshipped the ground that He trod.

I'm afraid that he hadn't, because I have read,
How He prayed in the garden alone,
For all of his friends and disciples had fled,
Even Peter, the one called a stone,
And oh, I am sure that, that black, white and tan,
With a heart so tender and warm,
Would never have left him to suffer alone,
But creeping right under His arm,
Would have licked those dear fingers in agony clasped,
And counting all favor but loss,
When they took him away, would have trotted behind,
And followed him quite to the cross.

A Reminder To Field Trial Fox Hunters

1. Fox hunting is done by hounds and observed by people.
2. Never speak to, nor otherwise interfere with a hound.
3. We are grateful to local committees and land owners who grant us the privilege of riding over their property.
4. There is no field without a gate.
5. If it becomes necessary to jump a fence take every precaution not to damage the fence, and if accidentally damaged report it immediately to the MFH, the field master, or the local committee.
6. Never cut a wire fence except to release an entangled hound, horse or save a human life.
7. Stay to the edge of planted fields, and never race through a land owners cattle or sheep, even though it means being lost by the hounds.
8. In hacking along the roadside all riders should be on the same side of the road, facing oncoming traffic.
9. A courteous "Good Morning" and "Thank You" to owners, tenants and employees and their children costs so little and means so much.
