The Oppressed Student

Dean Clarence Manton took some time off between his broadcasts No. 818 and No. 819 from South Bend, Ind. to ruffle a few pages of a new Houghton Mifflin book, "Push Comes to Shove." Noting that the book was written by Steven Kelman, 21, a Harvard Student, Dean Manton wasn't quite sure what he would find. But what he did find produced a few surprises for him, and maybe for you too. Among many other things, Harvard student Kelman reported:

"The university sanctuary is a protective womb that shelters us from the natural socks outside. In what we call on campus 'the real world.' The laws against liquor and drugs do not apply to us. Only visionaries could conceive of the leisuristic future society where the general population could enjoy the 'work week' we have.

"Students sleep most mornings till 10 a.m. Sixty-five percent of those in our age group have begun...a dulling job in the non-professional sectors of the economy or are off in Viet Nam. (But) we students are, at a cost of approximately $15,000 of our parents' money, enjoying the longest period of prolonged irresponsibility the world has ever known.

"Students are today's idle rich. Being idle, well fed, and generally satisfied gives us a chance to do a great deal of solitary thinking and 'soul-searching'--a term which has literal significance for us. And many of us, like Hamlet, end up thinking too precisely on the event.

"The oppressed student class can't talk to anyone over 30 because older people are no longer idle, have no more time to brood.

"When the member of the oppressed student class gets swept along on the New Left's red flag, it is on the basis of a misunderstanding. For the alienated would be the most desperately unhappy of all people in the regimented society which the New Left would institute..."

Interestingly enough, government witnesses have testified that the members of Marxist student cells at Harvard 25 to 30 years ago were not poor, but came from better-than-average-income families. The kids who were working their way through college didn't have time for Comrade Karl. The new book by Student Kelman indicates that not much has changed, except there are a lot more rich kids now than there were in the post-depression days.

UK Officials Do It Again ------- by John Kirk

From one end of these United States to the other our colleges and universities have experienced student uprisings that have all too often ended in violence and arson.

One of the most common bleatings of these student outlaws has been "Burn the ROTC building and build a people's park."

The University of Kentucky experienced student violence last spring for the second straight year. The ROTC building was burned by arsonists and the university was virtually closed down. Graduation exercises were postponed until August but only 400 of the approximately 4,000 spring graduates took part in the August exercises.

Shortly after the ROTC building was burned last spring, the student newspaper, the KERNEL, interviewed, as they said, several radical students as to their feelings about the fire. One student was quoted thusly, "They should burn the area into a people's park." And, my friends, that is exactly what your University of Kentucky is doing.

It was recently announced by George Ruschell, UK's VP for Business Affairs, that the area where the ROTC building stood would be turned into a $40,000 playground which will include two basketball courts, horseshoe, badminton and volley ball courts and a court yard, among other things.

Unfortunately, "The area won't be completely landscaped by the time the fall semester begins," Ruschell said. "But the courts will be blacktopped and lights will be ready," he said.

Now, isn't that something? Student outlaws can burn an ROTC building in the spring and close down a college and come back in the fall and find that they have been rewarded and that their park is ready for them (although, unfortunately Ruschell said, this park won't be completely landscaped by the beginning of the fall term).

Don't get me wrong, I'm all for parks and basketball and tennis and other sports too but I do not hesitate to say that the officials of your University of Kentucky have made another in a recent series of stupid misjudgments. It certainly is fine for the University of Kentucky to spend another $60,000 for a park but it seems clear to me that it is very, very moronish for them to locate the park upon the site of the destroyed ROTC building because this one park will, I believe, become a symbol of the success of the relatively few student revolutionaries who infest the UK campus, a symbol that they can point to and say "UK students, we did this for you. We burned the ROTC building and got a people's park built for you."

And the sad (and frightening) thing is that what they would say will be true.

MERCURY VAPOURS

By Warren R. Fisher

This week has been a bit off schedule and my efficient staff really "took over." I tried to stay off a bad knee, keep up with some job work, and have a holiday thrown in too. So Mercury Vapors may have gone by the board, but I was told I had this much space.

That much abused word "liberal" is in danger of becoming more of a liability than an asset to aspiring politicians. Candidates who have been quick to climb on the liberal bandwagon may change their minds when they read a late Gallup Poll. Mr. Gallup finds that by a majority of 3 to 2, Americans favor the "conservative" label. Popular understanding of a liberal ranges all the way from "someone who looks at all sides of a problem" to "someone who is generous with other people's money" and "a drug addict."

It's not surprising that "liberal" has become a misunderstood word. Politicians have reversed its traditional meaning for a long time. Under its banner, they have advanced measures that are the antithesis of liberalism--more government control over our lives.

Even advocates of socialism and communism parade their philosophies under the banner of liberalism.

THE PIED TYPER

By Bess Metz

It's been a long, quiet spell for pollsters, who have probably misplaced their ouija boards or else they are saving up their hot little statistics for hot little politicians at hot little election time.

Or they may be waiting for the computers to finish digesting all the census information to find out how many people are showering together so they can dress up the naked facts into something somebody can understand.

I don't trust computers and census takers who are privy to my bathroom habits, so I went down to the general store and conducted my own poll. You learn a lot this way, like never stand in front of the sawdust box when a man is thinking. And other things:

Q.: How will you remove your election bumper stickers?

5% thought hot water would do it.
15% thought tears would wash them off.
85% said they would leave theirs on if their candidates won.

Q.: What do you think of the potholes in the streets?

12% like them because they slow down hotrodders.
8% didn't have time to talk. They were looking for their children lost in the holes.
80% thought they ought to be closed down by police because pot is illegal.

Q.: What is America's greatest need today?

1% said freedom of speech.
1% said keeping outside speakers off campuses.
88% thought law and order, and threatened to kick me in the groin if I quoted them.
10% favored outlawing politakers.

Q.: Have you been aware of the ecology movement?

10% said they always took a round of antibiotics in the fall.
10% said the sheriff's department would stop it at the county line.
10% thought it was a new Republican strategy.

10% felt spraying with DDT would arrest it.

60% admitted they had only a vague idea what it meant and could care less.

Q.: Are you in favor of more taxes?

75% were in favor of more taxes for other people.
13% thought more taxes would only corrupt more politicians.
12% said flatly "no," unless they can get bigger federal refunds.

Q.: What would you do with campus rioters?

1% would love them.
50% would shoot them.
20% would put them on probation and make them report to their parents once a month.
29% would put their parents on probation and make them report to riots once a month.

Q.: Are you in agreement with the government's order to ban cyclamates?

50% said yes, because riding double is dangerous.
25% said yes, because it undermined marriages.
25% said it didn't matter because they didn't smoke that brand anyway.

Q.: Do you favor equal rights for men and women?

10 ugly girls said definitely yes.
10 pretty girls were willing to take their chances as it was.
20 men approved, if it meant getting to keep half their paychecks.

1 grouch said he would never allow a woman to shoe his mule.

Q.: Do you plan to vote Democratic or Republican in the next election?

89% said yes.
1% would vote for Al Capp, if he would keep L'il Abner out of trouble.
10% said they would as soon as they learned the difference.

Q.: Should the new model cars have more safety features?

50% approved as long as they looked expensive.
20% felt we should do everything possible to combat overpopulation.
30% were in favor if they did not wrinkle their clothes.

Q.: Are you influenced by what you read in your newspaper?

60% answered no. They didn't like the editor and nothing he wrote would influence them.
10% said they read the paper only to see what their neighbors got caught doing.
10% said they were influenced most by free coupons and divorce cases.
98% said they read the paper thoroughly each week.
1 clown said he always read it just before going to bed so he could go to sleep without a thing on his mind.

The total cost of operating the 31 white rural schools and the three colored schools in Nicholas County during the 1929-30 term was $80,090, according to a report of receipts and disbursements. $39,334.47 of the money spent on the schools was derived from local taxation and $13,480.10 from the state school fund, $21,500 was borrowed money.

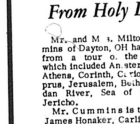
Man, Like Climbing Out On A Poll And Sawing It Off



The other day in the paper was a story and picture of an old gent, who died at the age of 95, leaving 173 descendants. This is indeed a record of note, but the thing that caught my eye was the picture of the old patriarch. He posed holding his favorite gun for the photographer.

This brought to mind a time when most dashing young blades preferred to have their pictures taken while they were gripping their shooting irons, each clutching mean-looking revolvers, did not exactly encourage you to go out and pick a fight with one of them.

Nowadays, a photographer needs a gun to protect himself against the ridicule heaped on him by his subjects. Show up for a club meeting with a 300-buck camera that refuses to capture on film the strange of ugly faces before it and the poor photographer is heckled without mercy. If the camera had worked and had not turned those unshaven, scowling faces into cherubs of wisdom, the cameraman would have also been held in contempt.

But I guess we don't have it as rough as the old time photographers. With all that artillery pointed at him, he was afraid to take anything except a perfect picture.

Southern corn leaf blight is causing both myths and questions. The most pressing question is: Can grain, green-chop, silage, and stalk be safely used as livestock feed?

Based on a limited number of controlled feeding trials, University of Kentucky College of Agriculture plant and animal scientists say "yes."

They have checked the results of other Southern agricultural experiment stations where corn is harvested earlier, and they found that the blight produced no toxic substances in the corn plant. However, there may be excessive molding in blight-damaged grain and silage. These will be the usual molds that develop in grain damaged by other causes and also in silage not properly packed and stored.

Mississippi State University researchers observed no sickness or deaths in test animals fed severely blight-damaged, green-chopped corn. Other stations doing similar studies have reported no toxic symptoms. When Mississippi scientists sacrificed the cattle, they found no signs of poisoning or toxic substances.

Members of the Agronomy, Plant Pathology, Animal Sciences, and Veterinary Science departments of the College of Agriculture who made the survey say they have checked out rumors of animal deaths resulting from feeding blight-damaged corn. They found these to be untrue. No deaths or sickness in animals that were fed blight-damaged corn in any form have been reported.

The experts recommend letting the blighted corn mature as long as possible. If the blight strikes the corn in the hard dough stage, the plant will nevertheless progress to make grain. Some ear rot will develop, but only about 10 percent of the yield will be affected.

Farmers are encouraged to use severely blighted corn for silage, even if the corn hasn't tasseled before the blight hits, grass silage can be made from the corn. Such corn should be cut and wilted, and 200 to 250 pounds of crushed grain per ton should be added to the grass silage to insure proper nutrient content. However, nitrate tests should be made on this type of material.

After tobacco has been cut and housed, is the best time to collect soil samples and make plans for fertilizing next year's tobacco crop. The first place to start in boosting yields and efficiency is to have the soil tested to determine which materials are needed and in what amounts. When the tests are obtained, don't try to cut corners and skimp on lime and fertilizer requirements. Lime is the first requirement for efficient production.

Leading authorities say that lime can return $15 for each $1 spent. An adequately limed soil stretches the dollars spent for fertilizers. Many Nicholas producers experienced manganese toxicity troubles in some fields this year. This fall is the time to correct this trouble.

Everett Smith has taken the local agency for the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company.

The following drough relief committee has been appointed for Nicholas County: L.B. Ross, chairman, Wyatt Insko, G.C. Myers, Arthur Mullikin, W.H. Branaman, John Hrabik, Wells, Dr. B.F. Reynolds, Mrs. Eda S. Taylor, C.B. Elston, and P.D. Darnall.

Approximately $41,000 in state and county taxes has been paid to date, Sheriff D.M. Curry reports.

Over the wheels on the Austrian field piece in the courthouse yard has rusted and is being repaired. The gun is the property of the American Legion.

Master Commissioner William Conley sold at public auction at the courthouse door Monday afternoon in the case of Mrs. Eva Floyd Hughes, a farm of approximately 40 acres of land on the Moorefield and Upper Lick Pike, A.A. Dale purchasing the tract for $1,150.

R.P. Templeman qualified in county court last week as administrator of the estate of his father, the late C.S. Templeman, with Sam Templeman, Mrs. Fannie Soper, Mrs. Lou Heilman and Mrs. Marguerite Grover as suretties in the sum of $5,000. J.H. Wilson, L.H. Vice and M.D. Judge were appointed appraisers of the estate.

The 16-acre farm of the late J.J. Jacobs, on the Moorefield and Upper Licks pike, about two miles from Moorefield, was sold at public auction by the heirs Saturday. The farm was sold in two tracts and then as a whole, Arthur Jacobs, of Montgomery county, one of the heirs, buying the entire farm at $54 an acre.

Sale will of Mrs. Rebecca A. Hamm was probated in county court Monday. The will directs the payment of all just debts, after which all the property of the testator is left in trust to Bruce Hamm, her husband and upon his death is to be divided equally among her children.

BORN--To Mr. and Mrs. Milford Berry, a daughter on Wednesday, Sept. 2, at the Mary Chiles Hospital, Mt. Sterling.--To Mr. and Mrs. Cee Barlow, Saturday from their home near Cynthiana.--Rev. W.W. LETTERS

Editor, The Carlisle Mercury:

After attending the football game Friday night, Aug. 28, 1970, between Nicholas County and Georgetown, and watching the halftime show "performed" by the Bluejacket Band, I feel that I must make a few observations about the show. I would hope that this letter will cause more people to attend the games and study the Nicholas County High School band as I have done.
