

Rebuilding Moral Fiber

(The Christian Science Monitor)

Surely it has occurred to many concerned individuals who live more or less single lives, more daily practice of the Golden Rule more compassionate attention to justice among men, there would be less need for massive antiracism legislation, less need to legislate morality among mankind.

nasium, with those young folks who complain that the leaders have made a bunch of things. Those people there... Yes it is not frankly true to the satisfaction of the undermining of moral fiber today is due to the transgressions, conscious or very nearly unconscious, of the adult generation... But how does one begin strengthening society's moral fiber? How shall the slow decay, which so many preachers and even politicians have observed, be reversed? To many this is a call for a more genuine practice of religion, or for the more earnest observance of humanistic virtues, but how is reform initiated? Where does it begin? Ask youth today—indeed ask many an older person—and the answer will be: Not by preaching, but by practice, by example-setting, by the active living of a moral life.

These are the small avoidances, the missed chances, that rear away at character and stability... But opportunity need not be forever lost... These are the small avoidances, the missed chances, that rear away at character and stability. But opportunity need not be forever lost. There is no time like the present to begin living the courageously daily life. Strength comes to him who uses it. And the end result will be the reemergence of morality and, indeed, a happier, saner existence for the individual and for the community.
