Agree or Not

Blame might be a better word than responsibility.

The letter asks the governor, "What role do you as governor intend to play in this session?" The letter also asks him to submit a plan or his recommendations on reapportionment to the legislature so the legislature can avoid the governor's veto.

These are the same legislators who traditionally have been howling for legislative independence and Gov. Nunn was the first governor they ever persuaded to give it to them and set up the interim committee system.

He put enough money in the executive budget in 1968 for the Legislative Research Commission (LRC) to operate the interim committee system.

The LRC staff, under the direction of James T. Fleming, has undertaken the chore of drafting an equitable reapportionment plan for both the House and Senate. Fleming has all of the census information from the Bureau of Census that is necessary to draw a fair reapportionment plan. It is broken down in census districts, and area blocks to show where the people are in the counties.

Crossing voting precinct lines in counties may be one of the big problems and some counties may have to redraw these lines. Some legislators have said they can't find a map of the voting districts for their counties.

Members of the House Democratic leadership signing the letter to the governor are Speaker Julian Carroll, Majority Floor Leader Terry McBrayer, Caucus Chairman Bill Reynolds, Speaker Pro-Tem Norbet Blume, and Joe Praether, Democrat whip.

The letter has political overtones. All are supporters of Judge Bert T. Combs. The letter indicates it was sent to others than the governor.

The reapportionment session is one that politics should be left out of, with responsibility to the people as a whole the guideline.

The Democrats recently elected former State Senator Shelby Kinkead of Lexington as state chairman. The office, vacant for months gives Kinkead an opportunity to offer some responsible leadership for his party.

The test of a good legislator is the job he does for the people of the state as a whole, and not a selfish interest for his own political future.

This is the place Kinkead could perform a real service for his party--getting unity to agree on a reasonable and acceptable reapportionment plan.

Instead, one of his first official party stands was criticism of the Nunn administration about strip mining in Eastern Kentucky and overweight trucks.

Of all things that Kinkead could be talking about, he chooses "t-r-u-c-k-s." Coal hauling was going on when he was in the Senate here two terms, and seems like there was something else about "t-r-u-c-k-s."

Remap Session To Start Feb. 25

The Kentucky General Assembly will convene in special session Feb. 25 to consider the reapportionment of the state's 138 legislative districts to make them conform with population shifts recorded in the 1970 census.

Gov. Louie B. Nunn announced the beginning date of the session last week in a "State of the Commonwealth" speech to the Kentucky Press Assn.

The Legislative Research Commission has already begun drafting tentative redistricting plans, and LRC officials indicate preparation of the plans could go well into late Feb.

The census figures show there must be slightly more than 32,000 persons in each of the state's House districts and about 84,000 in each of the Senate districts.

Recent court decisions have said all districts in a state could vary from the norm by no more than two or three per cent.

The job will have to be completed by March 31, the deadline for filing as legislative candidates from multi-county districts.
