Impact Resistant Lenses To Be Used For Eyeglasses

For the next seven months it's still a matter of "let the buyer beware" regarding eyeglasses and sunglasses, warns the Kentucky Society for the Prevention of Blindness. Leading the Food and Drug Administration's recent ruling that all glasses must have impact-resistant lenses, the Society emphasizes that until December 31, when the regulation goes into effect, it is up to the individual to insist that the glasses he buys are of the safety variety.

Currently 78 per cent of the Americans who wear glasses are wearing ordinary crown glass lenses, accountable for innumerable traumas that lenses have shattered into blinding shivers upon impact. The Society has spearheaded the campaign for impact-resistant lenses for the general public for the past 15 years.

The FDA makes the point that under new regulation, lenses will be impact-resistant—but not shatterproof. While providing greater protection than ordinary lenses, regulation lenses "will not provide an unbreakable shield against eye injury."

The FDA ruling on eyeglasses stems from provisions of the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, which gives the agency power to regulate or ban products that pose hazards to health and safety.
