Panel exempts mail

would be required to certify to the Price Commission that proposed rate increases are justified.

A spokesman for the council conceded that the policy announced yesterday is a "new direction" but insisted that the exemption of postal rates from controls was a "logical extension" of the economic stabilization structure.

The exemption for the Postal Service, he said, was to bring the policy on postal rates into line with that for determining other federal prices, such as the Atomic Energy Commission price for uranium. All these federal pricing agencies are exempt from controls.

The federal government has sales of about $38 billion a year, of which $12 billion is accounted for by the Post Office, the spokesman noted.

He said that the reason postal workers were not being exempted from wage controls is that their wages were determined by collective bargaining, and not set by a governmental agency.

The council asked the Postal Rate Commission to observe these criteria when it considered proposed postal rate increases:

That postal rates do not reflect or allow for future inflationary expectations. The rates may allow known changes.

That rates reflect productivity gains.

That rates are necessary to assure continued adequate service and provide the necessary expansion for future needs.

Rate increases may be permitted for full recovery of cost.

The council noted in its statements yesterday that there is a "general statutory requirement that the fees and rates of the Postal Service must be reasonable, equitable and in the public interest."

The council spokesman added, however, that if the Postal Rate Commission failed to impose these standards on the Postal Service, the council itself would have no recourse.

The council said it had accepted the third-class rate increase because the Postal Service had certified it was applying the anti-inflationary standards and criteria established by the council.

UK develops breed of low nicotine burley

Experts at the University of Kentucky Agricultural experiment Station say they have developed a breed of low-nicotine burley tobacco.

UK scientists said the new line contains about 1/2 per cent nicotine while normal burley strains average 3 1/2 to 4 per cent nicotine.

"To date, I think it's the most significant contribution toward overcoming a possible health issue," said Dr. Glenn B. Collins, plant geneticist in the UK College of Agriculture.

Nicotine is the substance most often suspected in the smoking and health question.

Collins said researchers now cannot say definitely that nicotine causes health problems, but indications are that it does influence test animals and organisms in laboratory tests.

He said the strong point in favor of the new burley line is that nicotine is reduced genetically without destroying aroma and taste, as often happens when artificial reducing such as filters are used.

Collins added that research is under way to also reduce tars in burley, another substance often mentioned in connection with smoking and health.

It may not be spring time by the time this issue of The Mercury is published, but the first part of the week reminded one of spring, and this picture of a mare and her foal or perhaps it should be plural looks quite spring like.
