Thousands of proverbs now exist about women

Thousands of proverbs have been coined about women. A group of West African sayings has a lively ring: "If you want peace, give a woman her own piece of gossip." "A woman's hair is strong enough to pull a man's nose." "A woman who marries a beautiful woman marries torment." Women take up their market baskets and also take up gossip!"

The Japanese pay tribute to the tenacity of women by saying, "A woman's hair is strong enough to keep an elephant tied," while the English claim, "One hair of a woman draws more than a team of oxen."

In some British and former British areas, local proverbs are colorful adaptations of old English sayings. Jamaicans say, "Puss may look 'em king but him radder may look 'em queen." In British Honduras, "Coward man keep soon' bones" is the Creole way of declaring that discretion is the better part of valor. Though useful, proverbs may be contradictory, as in "Look before you leap" and "He who hesitates is lost." The proverbial solution to this dilemma is "Circumstances alter cases." The last word might be "Wise men make proverbs, and fools repeat them."

Celebrate Our Heritage

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER

Our national anthem was written by Francis Scott Key in 1814. He had witnessed the bombardment of Fort Mifflin throughout the night with anxiety and when he saw the American flag still flying over the fortress, in the dawn, he expressed his feelings in stirring words that will live in American history.

Peace-loving skunks run afoul of 'immune' autos

Most Americans meet skunks only on the highway—and for most Americans that's enough.

The pungent aroma of a jay-walking skunk that lost a battle with an automobile frequently assails the summer traveler.

A skunk's very strength proves to be a weakness on the road. It ambles along without fear, not conceiving that anything would be rash enough to attack it. The National Geographic Society's safe enough in the woods, this behavior is fatal along a super-highway.

Skunk Commands Respect

In its natural habitat, a skunk prefers to live in peace and uses its ultimate weapon only for defense. Most woodland neighbors respect its wishes; those who don't face the consequences.

In a flash, the animal can discharge, through twin nozzles, a spray of stinging, acrid, yellowish liquid. A mature skunk can squirt from four to six separate discharges—accurate up to 15 feet.

The secretion is n-butyl mercaptan. Sulphur, an important component, helps give the fluid an evil odor that can be whiffed a mile away by the human nose. If weather conditions are right, the stink's scientific name, Mephitis mephitis, means that exhalation from the ground."

Mephitis makes its presence known from Atlantic to Pacific, and from Hudson Bay to just south of the Rio Grande. Useful as well as noxious, it uses mainly insects, rodents, and other pests, though it occasionally raids a henhouse on nighty hunting forays.

The only animal that regularly attacks skunks is another nocturnal hunter, the great horned owl, sometimes starving crows, cougars, and mink or a foolish dog will risk the overpowering barrage.

Boys Meet Skunks

When America was rural, skunks showed up on farms more often than highways. Writing in the National Geographic Society's "Wild Animals of North America," Melvin R. Ellis describes a classic hyphoid encounter:

"We turned to flee. We might have come out all right if only we hadn't turned in upon each other, smacking our heads together. Down we went. The six skunks, a mother and five half-grown youngsters, swung their bodies about, and all 12 guns belched salvo after salvo of malodorous fluid over our heads.

"Like Cuba being dive-bombed by Germans, we went scrambling and belching, sobbing and weeping, for the creek. Water helped some, but time was to be our only savior."

The skunks, fortified, we crept home and were immediately taken to the barn. The women stooped in their stalls as we passed. The bull rattled his chain and rolled his eyes, and from Hudson Bay to just south of the Rio Grande. Useful as well
